SANITATION PREVENTS LOSSES FROM BLACKHEAD

A few years ago the entire turkey-growing industry of the United States was threatened by blackhead. Since the cause has become better understood, the disease is largely preventable through the application of sanitary measures, says Wade H. Rice, Poultry Specialist for the University of Maryland Extension Service.

Blackhead is a parasitic disease that affects, principally, young turkeys in the early summer and late fall. It may also cause losses among chickens and older turkeys. Discoloration of the head of the bird that dies of the disease sometimes occurs. However, this symptom is seen also in other diseases, and does not always occur in blackhead. The most common symptoms are sulphur-colored, foamy droppings, droopiness, loss of appetite, and an invariable loss of weight.

Many turkey breeders now rear their poults artificially in order to prevent losses from blackhead. They keep the poults first in coops and runs that can be cleaned easily and later on pasture that is known not to have been ranged on by turkeys. Any turkey which shows symptoms of disease are removed promptly and isolated, and those which have died are buried promptly.

Chickens may contract the disease, says Mr. Rice, but they usually recover and remain as carriers of the organisms which are discharged in thier droppings. These organisms may infect other birds if picked up in contaminated feed or water and, as young turkeys are especially susceptible, they should never be allowed to run with chickens.

Tuberculosis Is Not Inherited

It is carried into a healthy family by someone who spreads it.

A careless spreader is likely to infect somebody else.

Once tuberculosis gains a foothold in a household it may spread within the family. The father is sick and spreading disease. The mother has become infected. One child is sick. The second child is in good health and the third child shows evidence of a healed infection.
