DISAPPOINTMENT.

Good fortune in disguise
Crept shyly to my door;
Want in her haggard eyes,
Grief in the garb she wore.
How should I know the guest
Who came so poorly drest?

With fear I let her in,
Who would not be denied;
No greeting did she win,
No welcome to my side—
This uninvited guest,
Who stole away my rest.

But in the morning light,
Another face was there;
I saw a visage bright,
A beauty strange and rare.
My dear, deceitful guest
Had put my faith to test.

Now Joy and I are friends,
Who thought to be estranged;
Now Fate hath made amends,
And all the world is changed.
For since I knew my guest
I find her gifts the best.

Albert was sent downtown by his mother to get some horseradish which she needed for her pickles.

After quite a long absence he came back home, tired and empty-handed.

"Well, where is the horseradish?" asked his mother.

"Why, mother, I went to every livery stable in town, and they didn't have a bit," answered Albert, with a weary sigh.

MISS FAINSWORTH.

Frank Harwood fell in love with a portrait. He tried to buy it, but was told that it was left to gain orders for an artist. He at once noted the artist's address.

Young Harwood had been brought up by his aunt, who had given him great freedom, except in one particular. She insisted that he should marry Miss Fainsworth. He declined positively even to meet her.

Going to the artist's studio, he knocked and was admitted.

"Mr. Brand, I believe?"

The occupant, an invalid with death written in his hollow eyes, on his blue veined hands, bowed assent.

"I came," said Harwood, declining the solitary chair which was proffered him, "about the picture exhibited in Mercer's window. It is not for sale?"

"No, sir."

"Not at a large figure?"

The artist did not at once answer. He was ill and very poor.

"Not at any price," he said.

"You could not make me a copy?"

"No, sir. The truth of the matter is this: the young lady who consented to sit for me for that picture did so out of her own sweet charity. She is so beautiful and makes such a fine study I fancied her face would bring me orders, where one less lovely, even if admirable as a likeness, would fail. I need not enumerate to you the reasons why it would be dishonorable for me to abuse her kindness."

"I understand your reasons, Mr. Brand, and respect them. May I give you an order for a life sized pastel from this photograph?"

He had fortunately remembered having in his pocket the picture of a nephew that morning received. The commission would help the poor artist.

A light tap came to the door.

"May I come in, Vincent?" called a sweet voice.

The door opened. Frank Harwood turned to look into the face that had haunted him waking and sleeping, but a thousand times fairer than the colored crayons had reproduced it.

She half drew back at the sight of the stranger, but Brand called to her:

"Come in, Claire!" And then, with youthful candor, "This gentleman was just asking about your portrait."

She bowed slightly. She was all in rich furs and deep, glowing velvet. The elegance of her attire puzzled Frank Harwood.

"I hope the picture is bringing you orders, Vincent."

"It is, indeed," he answered brightly.

"Well, it is late. I must go. I just ran in to see how you were getting on."

He smothered in a fit of coughing.

"You have the carriage?"

"No. I am on foot."

"I shall see you home then," the artist said, looking troubled. "This is not the best neighborhood in the world, and it is growing dark."

"The fierce cough shook him again. "You shall do nothing of the kind," she said peremptorily.

Harwood went forward, hat in hand. "Will you do me the honor of permitting me to accompany you? I am sorry I have not a card. My name is Frank Harwood."

She had been listening with a somewhat haughty air. She smiled now with sudden friendliness.

"I shall be glad if you will come with me," she said simply.

On their way she told him about Brand, whom she had known from childhood. "He is dying," she said. "It is hard to help him, he is so proud."

The house before which she paused was a magnificent one.

Harwood mustered courage to ask if he might call.

"No," she said gently, and then, as if repenting, "I shall be at Brand's studio on Friday."

She ran up the steps.

Needless to say Harwood was in the painter's room early on Friday afternoon. The number of orders he gave quite overwhelmed the artist.

She came at last, her face like a rose over her dark furs.

They met, not quite by chance, many times, and still Frank did not learn her name. He called her Miss Claire.

One evening, when he was leaving the studio with her, he told her the story of how he had first happened to come there.

"I fell in love with a pastel portrait," he said. "I am today in love with the original. But I know so little of you it seems like being in love with a spirit. Are you going to punish my presumption or reward my daring?"

She indicated her carriage that stood at the curb.

"Get in," she said, smiling. "I chance to be driving your way."

The vehicle stopped at his aunt's door.

"Do you know my aunt?" he began.

Just then his aunt came toward them.

"Claire, my dear!" she cried. "Frank, where did you meet Miss Fainsworth?"

"Fainsworth! he repeated blankly. "You"—he reproached Claire—"knew me all the time!"

Do you think I would have let you see me home that night if I had not?" she asked archly.

"What in the world are you children talking about?" Frank's aunt questioned.

They only laughed.

But there was that in the lovely eyes raised to his which told him he might plead again and not in vain.

Henpeckke—"As a rule death seldom affects me, but there is one man whose sad taking-off has filled my life with misery." Wigwag—"He must, indeed, have been a dear friend." Henpeckke—"On the contrary I never saw him. He was my wife's first husband."

Nell—"Miss Antique says you and she are old friends." Bell—"Yes; I may say that she is about the oldest friend I have."

Why the Leaves Turn Brown or Red.

No phenomenon of nature is more generally misunderstood than the color change that takes place in the leaves of plants in autumn. This is one of those common things that most people never think of studying, just because they are so common. But to neglect them is to neglect a veritable mine of interest and beauty, to say nothing of the information that lies there ready for our seeking.

Ten persons out of twelve, perhaps, believe that the leaves turn red, or yellow, or purple, or brown under the action of frost, but the truth is that frost has nothing to do with the change. If you will take the trouble to notice the trees in September and October you will see that the change begins long before we have frost.

As a matter of fact it is merely the ripening of the leaves, just as an apple reddens when it is ripe. Leaves are green in spring and summer because they have in their cells a substance called chlorophyll, which is made green by the action of sunlight. The green is of a pale shade in early spring because the chlorophyll is not fully formed. When that substance is fully formed the green turns darker.

Toward the end of summer the chlorophyll begins to decay, and then, because it is not supplied as it is in the season, the leaves change color or ripen, the green producing substance no longer being present. Exactly why some leaves turn red, some yellow and some brown is not readily explained, except by what we know of the action of light in producing colors. Some substances absorb the yellow and blue rays of light and reflect the red; others absorb the red and blue rays and reflect the yellow; and so on. The scientific reason why some rays are absorbed and others are reflected is that the corpuscles of the substances vary in size. This applies not only to leaves, but to all colored objects.
