EXECUTORS' SALE OF VALUABLE

REAL ESTATE,

NEAR WESTMINSTER, MD.

By virtue of power and authority contained in the last will and testament of Lawrence Zepp, late of Carroll county, deceased, and an order of the Orphans' Court of said county, the undersigned, executors named in said last will and testament, will sell at Public Sale, on the premises, on

MONDAY, the 11th of November, 1901, at 2 o'clock, P. M., all that valuable farm, recently the residence of Lawrence Zepp, situated about one-half mile east of the corporate limits of Westminster, Md., and adjoining the lands of William Struth and others, containing 175 ACRES OF LAND, more or less.

The land is of excellent quality and in a fine state of cultivation, arranged in fields of convenient size and under good fencing. There are about 25 or 30 Acres in good Timber on the farm. The buildings consist of a large substantially built Brick Dwelling House, with Back Building, all in good condition. Also a large and well arranged Bank Barn, and all other buildings necessary for a well equipped farm. There is good water both at the house and at the barn.

We call the special attention of purchasers to this property. The fine location of the buildings, its nearness to the county seat, and its general condition, make it one of the most desirable farms in the county. A portion of it is susceptible of advantageous division into lots if the purchaser should desire to make such division, and as the mains of the Citizens' Water Company pass through this part of the place, these lots could be easily and cheaply supplied with water. A plat of the property can be seen at The Union National Bank of Westminster, and those who wish to examine the property can call upon Dr. Leonard Zepp, of Westminster, one of the executors.

Valuable Lot fronting on the Baltimore and Reisterstown Turnpike.

Immediately after the sale of the farm, will be sold at Public Sale, on the premises, a desirable lot of land, containing

6 ACRES, more or less, situated near Westminster, on the Fair Ground Hill, fronting on the Baltimore and Reisterstown Turnpike and the old Baltimore road.

Valuable Wood Land, to be sold at 10 O'CLOCK, on same day.

The subscribers, as executors aforesaid, will sell on the premises, at 10 o'clock, A. M., on MONDAY, NOVEMBER 11TH, 1901,

the Wood Lot of the said Lawrence Zepp, late of Carroll county, deceased, containing

15¼ ACRES OF LAND, more or less, and situated about 3½ miles from Westminster, near the Gorsuch road, adjoining the lands of John Thomas Lovell, Peter Ritz and others.

TERMS OF SALE:—One-third of the purchase money to be paid to said executors on the day of sale or on the ratification thereof by the court, and the residue in two equal payments, the one payable in six months, and the other in twelve months from the day of sale; the credit payments to be secured by the bonds or single bills of the purchaser or purchasers, with sufficient security, bearing interest from the day of sale, or all cash at the option of the purchaser.

SIGNS OF WINTER.

When the rain begins a-fallin',
Like as if 't 'ud come t' stay,
An' the geese is honkin,' honkin,'
Overhead t'wards break o' day;
When a few stray leaves is clingin'
T' the sorry-lookin' trees,
An' the branches is a-swayin'
In the restless autumn breeze;
When the ragged clouds is flyin'
An' a tumblin' through the sky,
An' the grouse is seekin' shelter,
Whirrin', whirrin', as they fly:
When a sort o' chilly yeller
Lights the glimpses of the moon,
You'd best make your plans accordin',
For the winter's comin' soon.

OLD BALE.

H. D. LOWRY, in the Candid Friend.

They had been turning out the lights one by one for some few minutes, and now the cries of "Time, please, gents!" became urgent. Old Bale, who had sat reflecting moodily in a corner, tossed off his drink and went out into the streets, where a drizzling rain was falling. He had gone only a few yards, when he came to another public house, where they did not seem to have been so prompt in their obedience to the law. He tried to enter and snatch a last drink, but a man barred the entrance.

"Aw right, guv'nor," he said, "we don't open until 6 in the morning. You're a bit early."

Old Bale turned away, hating the man's coarse familiarity, and proceeded towards his lodgings in Pimlico.

He was a little unsteady, but not noticeably; there were few people about to disturb his progress, save for a loitering woman here and there, or a beggar at the gutter's edge. He hardly heeded the rain, and very soon the potboy's gibe faded from his memory; he began to be contented again.

He had had rather a good day. There were certain scraps of information of which he seemed to have the sole use, and the short memory of the public made it possible for him to sell them again and again as the seasons came round. He had read a paragraph in one of the morning papers that suggested such an opportunity, and had spent the morning in writing over again a story he had already told more times than could be counted.

He would be paid at the end of the week, and he had enough to go on with until then. Fingering the coins in his trousers pocket, and mechanically counting them, he gave himself up, at the same time, to calculations as to the amount that would be due to him for his day's work. Even his estimate of the sum was small, and he had to make deductions, for his expectations were always excessive in those days. He flung out his hands with a little theatrical laugh! It was amazing that such a one as he should be expected to take so paltry a wage as the payment of a day's labor.

His thoughts went back to the time when he was a sub-editor. He had never liked the work; it interfered with his books and stories, the things he did for their own sake, and without regard for the prejudice of editors. But it had been a time of great comfort, for he had had sufficient for all his needs. He remembered, too, how easily he had increased his salary; a little thing seen from a bus as he went home, or some chance remark that fell from him or a friend in the course of conversation, would serve as the excuse for a flippant column in an evening paper, or even in a literary weekly. And in those days, when the money was so little needed, when it came as a superfluity that might legitimately be wanted, he had been wont to get decent rates.

But a man can never tell when he is acting wisely. He had looked upon his position as sub-editor as something that would always be his; and when he had lost it he found that it was no longer possible to do original work. His so called friends had turned out badly, and behaved in a way that could not but discourage a man of a sensitive spirit. To this day some of them owed him money; little sums of no importance at the time, which they had forgotten, and he had been too proud to speak of. Some of them had since had the meanness to refuse him loans so paltry in amount that he had blushed for very shame, even while he asked for them.

They had probably fancied that he was played out, and need no longer be counted with. Most men, if one studied them closely, would be found to conduct their friendships on a purely businesslike footing. Then he reflected, and could not but admit that in some ways these doubters had been justified. He had not quite come off.

Well, there was still plenty of time. He had done a good deal, and had a certain reputation. He had rather neglected it, perhaps, but there were plenty of things that might yet be done. He had still his note books, and in them there were the materials for more novels than one; and each one would be a fine one. It was only February now, and he was a quick worker when he once began. He would get "Fato Profugus" done at once, so that it might appear in the autumn. Many publishers had asked him for books from time to time, and he would have no difficulty in getting the thing accepted, once it had been written.

He began to think of the story and of its characters. The heroine was to have been so beautiful. He thought of the sweetheart who had deserted him just at the time when his friends began to drop away.

He remembered, now, that all thought that drink was the enemy that paralyzed him and kept him idle, while others got the work he might have had. They were wrong. They did not understand how a sensitive man needed stimulants in moments of depression, or how long continued disappointment worked on him, and killed his early courage. Besides, he had always been able to give up drink. Again and again, whenever it had seemed to him that the habit had gained strength, he had reduced his alcohol to a minimum, and been none the less comfortable.

His reflections went further. After all, the best work he had done of late had been produced during these intervals of abstinence. Perhaps it was a mistake to go in for stimulants at all. Experience seemed to say so, and he had special reasons now for giving himself a chance. The book would be a thing worth doing for its own sake, and there would also be the pleasure of proving to his so-called friends that they had played the fool in slighting him. He would start afresh to-morrow, and prove his strength.

After all, he was a just man, and, now that he had faced the matter boldly, he could not but admit that they had had their excuses. They had certainly underestimated his strength, but they had known that he had let himself go too far. He had been on the brink; had even been lucky in escaping.

It was not of possible danger to himself he thought. But he had kept his mother from knowing how he played with the thing of which she had so great a fear. Whenever he went down to the little village where she still ruled the farm so well, he had managed to deceive her utterly. She had perhaps wondered why he was so irritable at times; he had been horribly cross with her on occasions. But she had never known, if she had once guessed.

He lurched from the pavement to cross the street. There was a shout, and Old Bale awoke to present facts; he was an old man; his mother had died after that appearance of his before a magistrate ever so many years ago. Something struck him brutally as he strove to step into safety. Darkness came on him, and he knew nothing of the trampling hoofs.

HELP.

Words of sympathy, deeds of truth,
Hearts that melt where the tears fast fall,
These are a part of the golden truth:
A kind goodwill is a help to all.

Duty is cold, though the heart be warm,
Life is a flame, and the soul lies deep—
Under the sun and the wintry storm,
The hills and valleys their purpose keep.

A purpose to bloom when the springtime comes!
A feeling, like love, that awaits its time,
Or a sword, that leaps to the sound of drums,
Or thought, that springs to the lilt of rhyme.

Dark! and the dew falls soft on the bud,
Day! and the sun creeps down to the seed,
Health and strength in the rolling flood!
Fragrance hid in the stony mead!

So we help each other by hope and trust,
The time will come to do and give—
If the lowly helper say, as he must,
Oh, patient toiler, rise and live!
