Select Poetry.

AT EVENTIDE.

Crimson, and gold, and russet,
Against the blazing sky,
The trees stood up in the sunset
As the wind went wandering by.

Crimson, and gold, and russet,
And drifting haze of rain
Caught up the western glory,
And gave it back again.

Just so, when life is sinking,
To the twilight time of tears,
Worn with the fret and fever,
The turmoil of the years,

Light, from the land we're nearing
Falls on the path we tread,
Like the smile we see through weeping,
On the faces of our dead.

—ALL THE YEAR ROUND.

Select Story.

MATTIE'S CHOICE.

If any one had hinted to pretty Mattie Woolston that she would ever figure as a heroine in a story, she would have opened her brown eyes wide in amazement. She was the only child of good old Mr. Woolston, of Greyport, a thriving town in Yorkshire, and in the circle of local society was considered at once a belle and an heiress. Hair and eyes the color of a chestnut when first the burr uncloses, a complexion as soft as satin and white as milk, with the prettiest rose tint of color on the round cheeks, white, even teeth set in a pretty smiling mouth, a figure tall, slight and graceful, were the attractions in appearance of the village beauty.

But those who knew Mattie Woolston well were wont to say that her pretty face and figure were the least of her charms. She had a low, musical voice, a manner graceful and easy, high-bred by intuition of what was dignified and maidenly; she was the neatest housekeeper in Greyport, and all her taste, full dresses and hats were the work of her own deft fingers. She had read intelligently, and could converse well.

So it is no matter for wonder that Mattie had many lovers. But foremost upon the list, to all appearance, was handsome Ned Gordon, who had been to the University, and whose father shared the aristocratic honors of Greyport with the doctor and clergyman, being the only lawyer in the town.

The clergyman was a bachelor of nearly forty years of age, who had come but recently to Greyport to preside over the church when the Woolstons and the Gordons had each a pew. He was a grave, reserved man, whose face bore the impress of sorrows and cares conquered, and succeeded by the serene peace that is far above the careless content that has never known interruption. He was not a handsome man, but had large, tender eyes under a broad white brow; and these would irradiate his homely face with a light almost divine, when he preached with an eloquence and simplicity rarely combined; so that men went from his church, slowly and thoughtfully pondering upon truths that were but homely, every-day facts, but suddenly had been illumined by earnest eloquence into paths to salvation.

One of these men, young, wealthy and full of talent, was Ned Gordon, Mattie's ardent admirer from boyhood. He had left her in sobbing pain of love to go to a boarding school, had left his heart torn when college took him again from Mattie, and had become more devoted than ever when he came "for good," to find her grown to womanhood, fairer than ever.

He had been wont to say of himself, when he considered the subject at all, that he "was not a bad fellow, as fellows go," being simply an idle hanger-on to his father's wealth, a desultory student of musty law-books when the mood seized him, floating carelessly down life's stream doing no special harm by the way, but assuredly doing no good either. Of his personal responsibility in the scheme of creation, he had never thought until the Rev. Harvey Stillman was appointed vicar of the fine old church at Greyport, where Ned's fine tenor was quite a feature in the choir. It must be confessed that under the dull prosy preaching of Harvey Stillman's predecessor, the choir seats had been a gathering place for much quiet flirtation among the bells and beaux of the town, and Ned's chief magnet was the certainty of sitting near Mattie, and hearing her clear sweet soprano join his own voice.

But before Harvey Stillman had been a month at Greyport, Ned was uneasily conscious that many of his words were as dagger thrusts at his own aimless, useless life, and waking to this consciousness, he also awakened to another disagreeable fact—namely, that Mattie was also perceiving that life was a more earnest, real thing, than she had before pictured it to herself.

She had never been a drone in the hive, but she had become more actively useful outside of her little house-world, visiting in a quiet, unostentations way, among the poorest of her father's patients, doing good in an humble spirit, but with a sincere desire to help, as far as possible, those who needed her gentle ministrations.

Ned loved her more than ever for the gentle self-denials she practiced so quietly that only those who were benefitted knew of them, but, to his great dismay, there came a little gulf between himself and his love, widening so gradually he could not tell where it had commenced or would end.

The first time since he was a mere boy he saw that Mattie gave him only the warm friendship of years of brotherly and sisterly intercourse, where he had given the first and only love of his life. She seemed drifting from him, absorbed in her new duties and leaving but little margin of time for the recreations they had shared for years. He was appalled by the fear of losing her, and yet she kept him from telling her either his hopes or his fears.

"She thinks I am an idle, good-for-nothing fellow," he thought, "and I never get any chance now to tell her I mean to buckle on my armor, too, and do my share of work. I am studying hard, and father will give me a start in my profession, that can be made a comfort to the afflicted and a light to the down-trodden. I mean to be all even Mattie can wish me to be, but can't get a word with her now. Last evening she was with that poor dying child of Crossman's, and to-day she is trying to comfort his mother. The last time I called she was at the National School, and when I do see her she is not the careless, merry-hearted Mattie of old. She thinks I am the same, though, and despises me for an idle good-for-nothing."

Some such pondering was in Ned's mind, when, driving his phaeton up the main street of the town, he overtook the Rev. Harvey Stillman going in the same direction. He reined in at once.

"If you are going my way, Mr. Stillman," he said, "will you let me drive you to your destination?"

"I am afraid I am going too far for you," was the reply. "I am on my way to Hawson's place."

"How fortunate I met you! It is fully three miles. Get in, and Black Prince will soon carry you there."

"But you?"

"My time is yours. Do not refuse me!"

The clergyman accepted the invitation, and before he fully perceived what he was saying, Ned was making him a confidant of all his perplexities and resolutions, till even his love story came out in earnest words. Led on by the quietly expressed sympathy in all his resolves to enter upon a noble and more usefel life, impetuous Ned, by a sudden inspiration, said: "If only Mattie could know how much it would help me to feel sure of her love? I cannot say if she ever cared for me as I care for her; but if I could believe she would by my wife when I deserved her, it would stimulate me as no other hope on earth could do."

"You think she loves you?"

The Rev. Harvey Stillman's very lips were white as he asked the question.

"I did think so once. Now, I would give all I own to be sure of it."

There was much more to the same purpose, till Ned, with a sudden gleam of hope, asked the clergyman to plead his cause.

"No one has so much influence as you have. She looks up to you as to a father," said Ned, never seeing how his listener winced at the comparison; and it you were to tell her how her love would aid me, she might believe I do not always mean to be the idler she has known."

"I will see her," was the grave reply. "If she loves you, she shall have the happiness of giving you the encouragement you desire."

But when the drive was over, and the clergyman entered his study, the quiet gravity of his face broke up into an expression of keenest suffering. He had borne many sorrows in his life. Death had taken his nearest and dearest, poverty had laid her heavy hand upon him; temptation had assailed him, only driven back by prayerful struggles. He had hoped to find in Greyport rest, after a long battle in life. His living promised him an easy competence and some leisure for studies he loved, without neglect of his higher duties. But before he had been in his new home many weeks Mattie Woolston's sweet earnest face, her gentle goodness, her unobtrusive, sincere piety had wakened in his heart an emotion he had never hoped to experience. Love had been a far off possibility for happier lives, and he had not perceived that it was seeking entrance into his own till Ned Gordon roused him to consciousness of what his deep interest in Mattie signified.

He loved her, and he had undertaken to plead the cause of another to her! Thought became such torture that he resolved to have the dread interview over, to know the worst at once. He found Mattie in the parlor of her father's handsome house, and, fearing for his own strength, told his errand gently.

The girly looked at him with white cheeks and a startled expression, as if she had received a sudden, unexpected blow where she had looked for kindness. Her great brown eyes had a haunted, piteous look that it went to his heart to see. She struggled for composure before she trusted her voice to speak, and it was low and tremulous when she said: "Since you are Mr. Gordon's ambassador, tell him, from me, that he has my most sincere good wishes for his success in his new life. He has no warmer friend, no more earnest well-wisher than myself. But I can never be his wife. I do not love him. We have been like brother and sister since childhood, and I can give him my sisterly affection, nothing more."

"I think he is sincere in his resolution to make his life more earnest and useful than it has ever been," the Rev. Henry Stillman said, his own pain urging him still to plead Ned's cause. "I hope he will persevere in his resolve. He may make a noble man."

"But his love"—

"I can never return," she said resolutely. "Pray leave me now. I—I am not well."

He left her. Only a few feet from the door he turned and retraced his steps. He had satisfled his conscience; had pleaded the cause of the younger, handsomer man. Faithfully he had placed before Mattie all Ned's pleadings, all her influence might do for him, and he had won only a steady refusal of the suit he urged.

Now—he set his teeth hard, and went back. Now he would risk his own fate! But at the door he paused, for Mattie had thrown herself in a deep arm-chair, and with her face hidden, was sobbing with a perfect passion of grief.

Was it for Ned? Did she already repent her decision? Irresolute whether to retreat or advance, Harvey Stillman stood in the door-way till Mattie, neither seeing nor hearing him, felt she was not alone, and looked up. In a moment she was on her feet, and for the first time the clergyman saw her eyes flash with anger.

"Why do you come back?" she cried. "Have you not sufficiently humiliated me?"

"I!" he cried, "I humiliate you?"

"What else is it to come to me to plead for Gordon's love? Is he an idiot that he cannot speak himself, but must make my name a byword by prating his love to every stranger?"

"Miss Woolston, you misjudge him and me—me most of all if you imagine I desire to humiliate you. I, who honor you above all other women! I, who came tearing my own heart to plead against it for your happiness! Do not judge me harshly, Mattie, for my love's sake!"

She had visibly brightened as he spoke, such dewy happiness rested in the brown eyes, such tremulous smiles gathered around the small mouth, that the Rev. Harvey Stillman felt his own heart throb with sudden rapture.

"Mattie," he cried, "I am many years older than you are, and yet I love you with all the strength of my heart!"

"And I love you."

Simply as a child, she told the truth of her own heart. He was not a man for any outburst of rapture. Tenderly he folded her in his arms, saying softly, "Thank God, darling!"

Nobody but Mattie and her betrothed knew why Ned Gordon resolved to pursue his studies in London instead of remaining with his father in Greyport, but years later, when he came back to the country town to take his father's practice, the Rev. Henry Stillman felt, with grateful emotion, that the good resolutions had not faltered, but had ennobled and purified the entire life of his old rival, while Mattie gave a cordial welcome to the pretty blue-eyed wife, who had won and kept the heart of her lover.

It had been noticed of late that many of the suckers and catfish in the creek near Marshall's paper mill in Kennett Township, Chester County, Pa., were found dead or stupid, and upon examination it was found that the fresh water leeches get into the gills of the fish in large numbers and sap their blood.

Trees of America and Europe.

That the United States consisted largely of unbroken forests is well known to all intelligent persons, and although sections have been greatly denuded none of the original species have become extinct. Few persons, however, are fully aware of the remarkable number of thsee species as compared with other parts of the world. In a report on Michigan State forrestry, Dr. W. J. Beal, an officer of the commission, makes some interesting statements, not only in regard to the forrestry of that State, but of the trees and shrubs of North America and Europe as well.

The relative importance of the trees and shrubs of this country as compared with those of Europe is surprising. Great Britain has one species of basswood, one maple, not over twenty feet high; one cherry, from ten to twenty feet high; one small ash, two elms, two poplars, one beech, large but not high; one small white birch, one species of pine, inferior to our white pine, and a species of oak which sometimes grows to a great size. About ten species of trees are natives of her soil. Michigan, with half the territory, has seventy species. Great Britain has no white wood, no white or red cedar, no hickory.

Michigan has six species of maple of tree size, a basswood, a white wood, honey locust, Kentucky coffee tree, two cherry, a pepperidge, five species of ash, a sassafras, three elm, a hackberry, a mulberry, a buttonwood, black walnut, butternut, six hickory, about twelve oak, a chestnut, a beach, four tree birch, four willow of tree size, six poplar, three pine, four spruce, one larch, one arbor vitæ and a red cedar.

In the Atlantic region of North America there are 292 species; in the Pacific region 152 species. In all Europe there are only 85 species of trees.

Naturally the question arises, What has caused this great disparity? Scientists explain it to their own satisfaction by attributing it to glacial action. Away back in their tertiary period the trees of the regions now possessing an Arctic climate were such as now thrive in a warm, temperate zone like that of Georgia and California. Then came the glacial epoch, when snow and ice for most or all of the year extended to the Ohio river. At the approach of cold the trees slowly retreated southward as generation followed generation. As the climate again gradually grew warmer the trees and other plants slowly migrated northward.

In a similar manner during the glacial epoch the plants of Europe were driven southward. Europe, says Dr. Gray in The American Journal of Science, is all within the limits generally assigned to severe glacial action. Most of the plants of the warm temperate region had perished, and therefore were unable to retreat when the continent became warmer. "So our lines have been cast in pleasant places, and the goodly heritage of forest trees is one of the consequences."

In response to an invitation sent out two years ago by the Council of the Meteorological Society of Great Britain, more than a hundred photopraphs of lightning flashes have been received by the society, showing knotted lightning, ribbon lightning, and flashes which appear like a lace curtain suspended in the air. The photograph of a celebrated dark flash, about the meaning of which there has been considerable discussion, has also been received.

A Swiss inventor has perfected a method of making artificial boards, and is advocating their use in building. They are made of a mixture of plaster of paris and reeds pressed into shape by hydraulic process. The material has the advantage of incombustibility and lightness, and will resist the warping action of atmospheric changes.

A young man who is learning to play the cornet writes to a Meadville paper that several stray bullets have found their way into his room, and he cannot understand why people will be so careless when they shoot at cats.

A Charleston druggist advertised that the milk of a cocoanut would remove freckles, and 4,000 of the nuts were sold at retail in two days to women folks. He got a commission on all sides. The freckles still abide.

As long as three women can sail along the sidewalk side by side, making all who meet them turn out into the gutter, why should they lose sleep because they can't vote?

A German was about to make a journey to his Fatherland, and, wishing to say "good-bye" to a friend, extended his hand and said: "Vell, off I don't come back, hullo."

The ladies are all opposed to the telephone. They don't care to have a young fellow whispering in their ears with his mouth twenty miles away.

A Connecticut man told his wife he was bound to have a purgatory on the top of his new house. Observatory was what he meant.
