What is Paternalism in Government?

The snow blockade of the public roads which was partially raised by the employment of labor, paid out of the county treasury at the instance of district road commissioners, furnishes our neighbor of the Advocate a text upon which to base a criticism of "paternalism in government," which that paper says "is the natural result of the Protective system." According to its authority, thirty years ago "the farmers and others did not go to the County Commissioners to have the roads put in passable condition, but took their horses and oxen and 'broke' the roads themselves."

It is questionable whether this statement is entirely accurate. The writer has personal knowledge of the employment of paid labor in Frederick county by a road supervisor, for this very service, fully forty-five years ago. Farmers and others did not then make a business of shoveling out of the county roads large embankments of snow without other compensation than the convenience of travel afforded themselves and their neighbors. In cases where it was possible to employ horses and oxen in breaking tracks the work was sometimes done as a frolic, but people in the antepaternal days were not much more given to wielding a shovel for that purpose, without compensation, than they are to-day.

But if it had been otherwise and all work of that character was done gratuitously, as against the demand for payment for such service to-day, wherein would the idea of paternalism be exhibited to any greater extent in the latter case than it is in the demand for pay for hauling stone to fill up a mudhole in a public road, or to shovel out a ditch to carry the water away from its surface, or to do any other thing to keep the roads in a proper condition to be traveled? As far as we know, nobody has ever questioned the propriety of having public roads repaired and kept in order at public expense. Why should the county pay for repairing a washout in summer, yet neglect to remove an obstruction in winter? Wherein is paternalism exhibited in one case and not in the other, if the county does the work in both? Property is taxed to provide money to keep the roads in a condition to be traveled throughout the year—not for a portion of it. Is it paternalism to do this in the winter, but not paternalism if done in the summer?

But after all, let us go back to the caption of this article: "What is Paternhlism in Government?" The Advocate and papers of its class make a distinction in cases not materially different, placing an act on the side of paternalism which in no way differs from an act that passes without question or objection. Does such a distinction exist, and if so upon what authority or upon whose decision? To answer such a question in the affirmative would certainly be illogical.

The real answer to the whole question, we believe, is, that all government is in a measure paternal. The Democratic theory of it seems to be that the less of government we have the better, all government being more or less objectionable. It is to be said in this connection, however, that this is only theory with that party, and that its practice is about as different from it as winter roads are from summer ones. The Republican party, on the other hand, believes that government is necessary and beneficent and that if the welfare of all the people can be promoted by the enactment of laws for their government such laws should be placed upon the statute books. If a protective tariff law will make all the people of the country more prosperous and comfortable than a "tariff for revenue only," the Republican party believes—and acts upon its belief—that protection should become a part of the economy of the government. The Advocate calls that paternalism; but it is no more paternalism than the imposition of a tax on the individual citizen to provide pensions for worn out police officers; or to establish courts; or to make governors, maintain schools or do any other thing that may be for the benefit of the people in the aggregate, although cases of individual hardship may be occasioned. Democrats do not object to forcing individual property holders to pave their sidewalks, or macadamize the streets in front of their premises. They raise no voice against the condemnation of private property for public uses—all of which may fairly be regarded as the strongest sort of paternalism. But they object to protection, which has not a whit more of this principle in it than most of the examples cited.

From all of which it may be fairly deduced that paternalism in government is, practically, government itself.

Postmaster General Wilson S. Bissell has resigned and the President has nominated Hon. Wm. L. Wilson, of West Virginia, as his successor.

Notwithstanding the stringency of the times there is much to be grateful for. The Fifty-third Congress will come to an end at 12 o'clock, M., on Monday.
