Voters Will Know.

PUBLISHED BY REQUEST.

John Walter Smith's the very man,
At Gorman's feet to tumble,
Whilst Vic and Van spy out the land,
And see that none do grumble.

Rasin with his body rotund,
His grip upon the combine,
Silly opens the Gorman fund,
For Poe the law to define.

Hering, loathing, shoves out the tin,
Five score and ten thousand more,
Extra session's the very pin
The Comptroller's cash to score.

Olin Bryan is strong on pay,
From the State and Baltimore,
Does sewer work for Tommy Hayes,
On the extra session's floor.

Walter proclaims it mighty strong,
For birds and trees and such things,
But then its all for leaves and songs,
Not for votes that will not string.

Vic and Murray, precious pair,
Acting as the voters' guide,
But greater still with soldiers' air,
As they strut by Walter's side.

Ignorant men, they shall not vote,
Gorman and Rasin command,
John Walter Smith comes in by rote
To declare the same demand.

Says voters must their tickets read.
If in Maryland they would vote,
Gorman has made another creed,
That his friends for him will quote.

Erin's harp, and hickory tree
Will no longer have their spell,
For Gorman with the greatest glee,
Sounds to many votes the knell.

Jackson and Liberty they say,
O'er the harp so old and true,
Will not appear on 'lection day,
To exclude voters so blue.

Good old Democrats, sound of breath,
Damn the leaders in their wrath,
And ask to know what on the earth—
Is being done for Hering's cash.

MY CORRESPONDENT.

—:o:—

AN EASTER STORY.

By a Woman Editor.

"I cannot write for you any more," said a letter from one of my most esteemed correspondents and friends. "The soul of my life has fled. Only the gaunt skeleton of existence remains to me. There is no more poetry, no more art, no more inspiration for me. My little daisy is dead."

I knew it was impossible that such feelings should be lasting. But a change of scene, of association was very necessary to Aurelia. My next letter contained a pressing invitation for her to spend the winter with me. At first she resolutely declined, but when I made a journey to her home on purpose to bring her back with me, Aurelia yielded impassively and suffered herself to be brought away.

I anticipated a double pleasure in presenting Aurelia Desmond to my friends. She was a poetess of the rare, simple type, and I determined to veil her with a halo of mystery.

Aurelia had been an orphan from infancy. Her mother had been of Quaker parentage. By Aurelia's marriage with one of the world's people she had forfeited the religious sympathy of the congregation.

It was partly for her own benefit that I determined to conceal her history from her new acquaintances, since the purpose of her visit would, doubtless, be the more effectually gained if I could be spared all those condolences and expressions of sympathy which the knowledge of her desolate condition would naturally call forth.

She was introduced to my friends only as Miss Desmond.

She certainly attracted as much attention as I could have desired, for the charm of her beauty and intelligence made her everywhere an object of interest.

But she herself was little affected by this attention.

"Aurelia," I said, one bright winter morning, "let us go down town. A friend of mine has just finished a beautiful picture; at least, he considers it his masterpiece, and invites my inspection. It will be a pleasure to you to accompany me, I am sure."

"Yes," she replied, simply; "I like pictures. I hope it is a landscape with
