SONG OF TRIUMPH FOR REPUBLICANS.

Mr. William B. Severe, of Riverdale, Prince George's county, is among the first of the campaign bards to contribute to the present battle for ballots. Mr. Severe chooses the familiar air "Marching Through Georgia," and submits the following:

"Song of Triumph." Dedicated to Hon. Stevenson A. Williams and the candidates on the Republican ticket:

Rally 'round our standard, boys, and sing our good old song:
Sing it with a vim, and let it echo loud and long;
Sing, for vict'ry waits you, boys—yes, sing a happy song.
For we shall triumph in November.

Chorus:
Hurrah! Hurrah! For Williams and the rest.
Hurrah! Hurrah! Our ticket is the best.
When we get on the War field we will put our foes to rest,
For we will triumph in November.

Drop the faction-feeling, boys, and get in line to win.
We are all Republicans; we don't want fights within
Our ranks, but make them solid boys. To lose would be a sin.
Say, we will triumph in November.—Chorus.

We've got a hustling Hanna, boys, to lead you in this fight.
You want to get together, boys, and do the thing up right,
Vote our ticket straight and knock our foes clear out out of sight.
And we will triumph in November.—Chorus.

Remember, we're for Party, boys, and Party wins the day.
Don't be misguided when you vote, VOTE STRAIGHT; don't be a jay.
We want the House and Senate—we want all to come our way—
When we shall triumph in November.
—Chorus.

Then rally round our standard boys and sing a happy song—
"The Grand Old Party Banner," boys—and vote to right a wrong.
Knock out those crooked 'lection laws; don't let them stay there long
After our triumph in November.—Chorus.

Just a Tiny Bit of Tact.

As the gas bill of a portable theater staying in Durham had not been paid at the week's end, a man appeared on Monday night to cut off the supply unless the bill was paid on the spot.

The door-keeper remonstrated with him pointing out that the manager was on the boards at the moment, and could not possibly leave the stage for some time; the gas man might call then.

"No," said the gas man obdurately; "I'm going to cut it off now."

"Hold hard," said the door-keeper, "I'll go and tell the boss."

Disguising himself in a huge red cloak and a great felt hat with a drooping feather, and with a sword at his side, he walked onto the stage and said in a tragic tone:

"Behold, my lord, the man stands at the castle gate waiting to be remunerated for the glimmers, and if not seen instantly darkness threatens us!"

Tho manager at once grasped the situation, and replied:

"Ah-ha! Prithee, sirrah, take me to the varlet! His wants shall be attended to! Go! I follow thee!"

The money was paid.

His Bump of Location.

The minister was looking for a sober janitor, and he found John. John is a strapping fellow, clean and wholesome looking. The minister was much pleased with John.

And John had some good recommendations and seemed to know his business so thoroughly that the minister engaged him.

"Do you know where the church is?"

John shook his head.

"Well, it's down on the south side of East End avenue, near Lexington street. Now do you remember?"

"Aw, yis," said John. "It's the wan just across from Mike Sullivan's saloon."

"My darling! What delights you so? What is it that fills your eyes with the glad light of happiness, and"——

"Oh Theobald, just think! Cook is going to remain with us, after all! Mrs. Goodparty, for whom she was going to work, dropped dead last night. Oh, wasn't it just too sweet of her; and, do you know, I had always fancied she disliked me!"

Don't fail to Register Tuesday next.

For the Sentinel.

STEVENSON ARCHER WILLIAMS.

Many qualities, almost all good, even in the democratic press of Maryland, have been attributed to Mr. Stevenson Archer Williams, the republican candidate for Governor of this state; but, that he is a clever resourceful, although scrupulously honest politician, has not yet been put in print, and this to some minds will be his strongest card.

That Mr. Williams is honest all men know. That he is an agreeable courteous gentleman, highly polished and well educated, all who read must also know. But that he is resourceful, shrewd and very skillful in the many sided game of politics, without finding it necessary ever to be tricky, is a quality that not all, in fact very few of his own party friends know that he possessed. In fact while men all over the state entertain the highest respect for him and while the democrats themselves have found very little to say in an uncomplimentary vein, the fact remains that he is and has been underestimated from the start, and that, singularly enough too, by the very men who should have understood him best.

Through all the whirl and turmoil of the factional fright waged until this time in the republican party, it is a singular thing that Mr. Williams' positive character that he is and as every reader of newspapers throughout the state must have seen, has antagonized none in any faction and stands today in the bright glare of a fiercely contesting and furiously working party, split in many things but an absolute unit with only one thought so far as the gubernatorial selection is concerned, and thanks to him in a large measure, so far as the state ticket likewise is concerned.

The republican rows up to this time will all act in Mr. Williams' favor and if there is a man in the city of Baltimore or in any county of this state who has the slightest idea of venting his disappointed spleen on the principal nominee, his identity is a secret and his whereabouts unknown.

And so smoothly has his entire campaign been managed that to the casual observer, what has in reality been the calm, careful and skillful play of a trained hand, must have seemed more the drift of events and the luck of the player, which after all is the acme of perfection in doing anything or playing any game.

Mr. Williams is of Welsh descent and of the fourth generation in Maryland, his great grandfather having settled in Harford county, near Havre de Grace, in the middle of the 18th century. He himself is a graduate of Princeton and later of the University of Maryland. He is a successful lawyer with an extensive and lucrative practice, besides being the president of the Harford National Bank of Bel Air, the strongest institution of its kind in the county.

Mr. Williams as a State Senator during the sessions of '98, 1900 and the extra session of 1901, when he practically led his party forces on the floor of the house, showed particular vigor in his assaults on the census bill, which is now generally admitted to have cost the state, unnecessarily, over $50,000.

Although his official campaign for governor has just opened, the quiet work of the past few months, the work of his indefatigable friends, while he was quietly waiting to learn the people's choice, has not been without its effect, and the campaign which has just begun in earnest will not be of a nature to disappoint the most systematic republican worker.

For the men who like to follow a leader to success, the assurance is held out and the statement repeated that Mr. Williams is anything but a novice at the game, in fact having shown himself an adept when he showed the state so clearly that he is no man's candidate and the figurehead for no faction.

He is a very lovable man, just what he seems, and being the Governor of Maryland will work no change in him. His friends will be all the closer to him then and his opponents no whit less fairly dealt with, nor less courteously received. That is a characteristic of the man, and one of the pleasures incident upon knowing him.

What Is Best.

Fowls thrive best in high, dry and sandy soils, but they will thrive anywhere if given care. And under usual conditions a variety of food is better than any medicine you can give them also. Light, nutritious food is the food to give fowls in confinement; fowls that range can be fed the coarser foods. And one good way of losing chicken money is to keep a lot of cockerels after they have quit growing.

TUESDAY, OCT. 6th, will be registration day, and every unregistered Republican voter should avail himself of the opportunity to have his name placed on the list of registered voters.

CUTTIN' CORN.

BY S. W. GILLILAN.

Folks may hanker all they keer to
Fer th' country in th' fall,
They may rave about th' beauty
Of th' autumn leaves an' all:
They may talk about th' glory
Of th' sunshine and th' haze,
They may gush about th' grandeur
Of th' gold an' purple days,
But they's just one reckolection
Makes me glad as sure's your born—
Gee, I'm glad 'at I'm not out there
Cuttin' corn!

Spanish needles in your jumper
An' yer threadbare overalls;
Cockle-burs as thick as hops that's
Growin' on th' garden walls;
Dead ol' blades that keep a-sawin'
At your blistered neck an' ears—
I recall it jest as easy,
Though its been a heap o' years
Sence I ust' t' take my cutter
An' go growlin' out at morn
Go put in a whole long day at
Cuttin' corn.

Heap o' things a man don't fancy
In this city life o' ours,
Where ye've got t' keep a spurrin'
At yer mind's and body's powers;
Sleep don't find your eyes so easy
As it did when you was tired
With the long day's tug an' rustle
That the farmin' work required,
But ye'll never catch me frettin'
Ner a-pinin' 'round, forlorn,
While I realize I'm safe frum
Cuttin' corn.

Worth Waiting For.

BY INA LEON CASSILIS.

From the American Queen.

"I see how it is," the man said, bitterly. "Duty is such an easy catchword. If you love me you couldn't give me up so calmly; but you don't love me—that's it!"

The girl stood with her head drooping, the burning tears dropping down her face and onto her clasped hands. She lifted her eyes for a moment to the handsome, angry face, seen dimly through a mist of tears.

"Love isn't everything," she said. "Duty comes first!"

"Duty! Is it duty? It's only natural for sons and daughters to marry, and leave their first home."

Lilian Grey's fair face flushed. "You are not putting it fairly, Arthur. It is not natural—at any rate it is not right—for an only daughter to leave a father who needs her, who cannot do without her."

"If that's all," said Arthur Morton, "let him live with us."

"No, that will not do. You, as my husband, would claim my first attention, and whatever you might do at first, you would by-and-by exact it."

"And you say you love me!" cried the young man with angry sarcasm.

"Far more," she answered, quietly, "than you love me."

"You've an odd way of showing it!" he said. "Your father himself would not wish you to make such a sacrifice."

"Because he is unselfish; but my first duty is to him, and I must do it, whether I suffer or not—whether you suffer or not. There are other things to live for but happiness; I could not, besides, be happy, if I left my father in his old age and his loneliness."

"He may live for years; and your youth be wasted——"

"Wasted!" interrupted Lilian, with flashing eyes. "You seem to have no god but self. It's not my happiness you are thinking of, after all, but your own."

"Oh, very well," was the passionate retort; "if you only want an excuse to break with me—one is as good as another. I like a little more of heart and a little less of the rigid sense of duty. Good-by!" Without a word more, he turned from her and strode away down the field path. He was in a white heat of passion. Lilian looked after him in a sort of agony; then sank down on the meadow grass, covering her face and sobbing. But her bitterest grief was for the disillusionment of those moments; the keen sense of disappointment stabbed her like a knife. The man to whom she had given her heart had flashed out in his true colors, and shown himself selfish, exacting, even unfeeling, save for his own happiness. Hard though the parting was, the girl felt that it was better so, better that the test had to be put, for it proved the metal of the man's character. She rose up after a while, and walked slowly back to the pretty cottage where she and her gray-haired father lived. It was not until two or three days had passed that she told the old man what had happened, and that she had sent Arthur Morton away. He was grieved. "My child," he said, you should not—you have your life to live—mine is almost over——" But she knelt by him and took his hand in both her own. "Father," she said, you must never speak to me like that again. You are always first with me."

"Well, dear," he said tenderly, "perhaps it will not be very long."

But three years passed, and he still lived.

"But I cannot give you the promise you ask; I cannot leave my father."

It was not to Arthur Morton that Lilian spoke; but to a man older, graver, with deep bronze on his cheek, and a steady light in his keen gray eyes.

"But, if you love me?" he said, taking her hand in his.

"Yes," she answered, softly. "I love you—but—my duty comes first."
