Rainbow Song

When the rain is almost over,
And the dew is on the clover,
When the fragrance of the roses fills the air;
While you hear the birds' soft twitter,
And the raindrops are a glitter,
Then the earth refresh'd by showers seems more fair.
Harvest fields no more are parching,
And above them now is arching,
Like a many colored banner in the sky;
Such a lovely rainbow glowing,
All its wondrous colors showing,
For 'tis spreading forth its colors now on high.

CHORUS.—There up in the sky,
'Tis glitt'ring in its radiant colors sev'n;
Shining, O so high!
Flung like a banner o'er the heav'n;
There! up in the sky,
It is the wondrous bow of promise giv'n;
Yonder in its light,
Behold the rainbow bright!

'Tis the work of Master painter,
Yet the hues are growing fainter,
And ere long they will have pass'd from sight away;
For the sun the arch will scatter,
And 'twill fade away—no matter,
Just you look for one another rainy day.
When you see the rainbow glisten,
Here's a secret, listen! listen!
For 'tis told by fairies in their mossy dell:
At the rainbow's end, now mind it!
Is a pot of gold, so find it!
Tho' how far you'll go, there's not a one can tell.

COURTING OF LADY JANE.

(By Josephine Dodge Daskam in the Delineator.)

The Colonel entered his sister's room abruptly, sat down on her bed, and scattered a drawerful of fluffy things laid out for packing.

'You don't seem to think about my side of the matter,' he said gloomily. 'What am I to do here all alone, for heaven's sake?'

'That is so like a man,' she murmured, one arm in a trunk. 'Let me see: party-boots, the children's arctics, Dick's sweater—did you think I could live here forever, Cal?'

'Then you shouldn't have come at all. Just as I got thoroughly settled down to flowers in the drawingroom, and rabbits in a chafing-dish, and people for dinner, you skip off. Why don't you bring the children here? What did you marry into the Navy for anyway? Nagasaki! I wouldn't live in a place called Nagasaki for all that money could buy!'

'You're cross,' said Mrs. Dick placidly; 'please get off that bath wrapper. If you don't like to live alone—six bath-towels, Dick's shoe-bag, my old muff (I hope and pray I'll remember that!) Helen's reefer—why don't you marry?'

'Marry? Marry! Are you out of your mind, Dosia? I marry?'

The Colonel twisted his grayish mustache into points; a look of horror spread over his countenance.

'Men have done it,' she replied seriously, 'and lived. Look at Dick.'

'Look at him? But how? Who ever sees him? I've ceased to believe in him personally. I can't look across the Pacific. Consider my age, Dosia, consider my pepper-and-salt hair, consider my bronchitis, consider———'

'Consider your stupidity? As to your hair, I should hate to eat a salad dressed with that proportion of pepper. As to your age, remember you're only five years ahead of me, and I expect to remain thirty eight for some time.'

'But forty-three is centenarian to a girl of twenty-two, Dosia.'

The Colonel was plaiting and unplaiting the ball-fringe of the bed-slip; his eyes followed the motion of his fingers; he did not see his sister's triumphant smile as she dived again into the trunk.

'That depends entirely on the girl. Take Louise Morris, for instance: she regards you as partly entombed, probably'—the Colonel winced involuntarily—'but on the other hand, a girl like Jane Leroy would have no such nonsense in her head, and she can't be much more than twenty.'

'She is twenty-two,' cried the unsuspecting Colonel eagerly.

'Ah? I should not have said so much. Now such a girl as that, Cal, handsome, dignified, college-bred, is just the wife for an older man. One can't seem to see her marrying some young snip of her own age. She'd be wasted on him. I happen to know that she refused Wilbur Vail entirely on that ground. She admitted that he was a charming fellow, but she told her mother he was far too young for her and he was twenty-eight.'

'Did she?' The Colonel left the fringe. 'But—but perhaps there were other reasons—perhaps she didn't——'

'Oh, probably she didn't. But still she said he was too young. That's the way with these serious girls. Now, I thought Dick was middle-aged when I married him, and he was thirty. Jane doesn't take after her mother; she was only nineteen when she was born. I mean, of course, when Jane was born. Will you hand me that crotcheted shawl please?'

'My dear girl, you're not going to try to get that into that trunk, too? Something will break.'

'Not at all, my dear Clarence. Thank you. Will you send Norah up to me, as you go down?'

It had not occurred to the Colonel that he was going down, but he decided that he must have been, and departed, forgetting Norah utterly before he had accomplished half of the staircase.

He wandered out through the broad hall, reaching down a hat absently, and across the piazza. Then, half unconscious of direction, he crossed the neat suburban road and strolled up the gravel path of the cottage opposite. Mrs. Leroy was sitting in the bay window attaching indefinite yards of white lace to indefinite yards of white ruffles. Jane, in cool violet lawn, was reading aloud to her. Both looked up at his light knock at the side door.

'But I am afraid I interrupt,' he suggested politely, as he dropped into a low chair with a manner that betokened the assurance of a warm welcome.

'Not the least in the world,' Mrs. Leroy smiled whimsically.

'Lady is reading Pater to me for the good of my soul, and I am listening politely for the good of her manners,' she answered. 'But it is a little wearing for us both, for she knows I don't understand it, and I know she thinks me a little dishonest for pretending to——'

'Mother!'

The girl's gray eyes opened wide above her cool, creamy cheeks; the deep dimples that made her mother's face so girlish actually added a regularity and seriousness to the daughter's soft chin. Her chestnut hair was thick and straight; the little half-curls of the same rich tint that fell over her mother's forehead, brushed wavelessly back on each side of a deep widow's peak.

The two older ones laughed.

'Always uncompromising, Lady Jane!' the Colonel cried.

'I assure you, Colonel, when Lady begins to mark iniquities, few of us stand!'

Jane smiled gravely as on two children. 'You know very well that is nonsense,' she said.

Black Hannah appeared in the door, beaming and curtesying to the Colonel.

'You-all ready foh yoh tea, Miss Lady?' she inquired.

A sudden recollection threw Mrs. Leroy into one of her irresistible fits of gentle laughter.

'Oh, Lady,' she murmured, 'do you remember that impossible creature that lectured me about Hannah's asking you for orders? Did I tell you about it, Colonel?'

Jane shook her head reprovingly.

'Now, mother dearest, you always make him out worse——'

'Worse, my darling? Worse is a word that couldn't be applied to that man—worse is comparative. Positive he certainly was, superlative is mild, but comparative—never!'

'Tell about it, do,' begged the guest.

'Well, he came to see how Lady was growing up—he's a sort of species of relative—and he sat in your chair, Colonel, and talked the most amazing Fourth Reader platitudes in a deep bass voice. And when Hannah asked Lady what her orders were for the grocer, he gave me a terrible look and rumbled out, 'I am grieved to see, Cousin Alice, that Jennie has burst her bounds!'

'It sounds horribly indecorous—I expected to see her in fragments on the floor—and I fairly gasped.'

'Gasped, mother? You laughed in his face?'

'Did I dearest? It is possible,' Mrs. Leroy admitted. 'And when I looked vague, he explained, 'I mean that you seem to have relinquished the reins very early, Cousin Alice!'

''Relinquished? relinquished?' said I, 'why, dear me, Mr. Wadham, I never held 'em!''

'He only meant, mother dear, that——'

'Bless you, my child, I know what he only meant! He explained it to me very fully. He meant that when a widow is left with a ten-year-old child, she should apply to distant cousins to manage her and her funds.'

'Disgusting beast!' the Colonel exclaimed with feeling, possessing himself of one of Hannah's beaten biscuits, and smiling as Lady Jane's white fingers dropped just the right number of lumps in his tea.

How charming she was; how dignified, how tender to her merry little mother, this grave handsome girl! He saw her in fancy opposite him at his table, moving so stately about his big empty house, filling it with pretty, useless woman's things, lighting every corner with that last touch of grace that the most faithful housekeeper could never hope to add to his lonely life. For Theodosia had taught him that he was lonely. He envied Dick this sister of his.

He wondered that marriage had never occurred to him before: simply it had not. Ever since that rainy day in April, twenty years ago, when they had buried the slender, soft-eyed little creature with his twisted silver ring on her cold finger, he had shut that door of life; and though it had been many years since the little ring had really bound him to a personality long faded from his mind, he had never thought to open the door—he had forgotten it was there.

He was not a talkative man, and like many such he dearly loved to be amused and entertained by others who were in any degree attractive to him.

CONCLUDED ON FOURTH PAGE.
