HOW ABOUT THE TIME COST OF LIVING

Man's primary asset is time. His cost of living should be measured by time expended in earning it. The typcal family spends less time today maintaining itself than did the family of a geneartion ago. The head of the modern household usually works eight hours and is apt to be the sole producer. Eight hours a day supports the family. A geenration ago father worked ten or twelve hours regularly, supplemented by a son in the field or shop, and a wife with a flock of chickens and a shelf full of preserves. It undoubtedly cost that family sixteen hours daily labor, or more, to live. Sixteen hours against eight. W elive cheaply toda yin point of time cost—that ,s if we are really living.—Colliers.

Old-Time Christmas

OUR forefathers had few of the opportunities for enjoyment we have nowadays, but what opportunities they had they made full use of. The grand time of mirth and jollity landed round about Christmas and the New Year, and for days they let themselves go with an enthusiasm that would leave this present age far behind.

In country districts all work ceased for three or four days at Yule. This meant that for a number of weeks previous flails had to be busy early and late threshing a sufficiency of straw and grain to last through the holiday time. The women folk had to be as busy inside as the men were out. The "Yeel kebback" had been long before well pressed and "wun," but ale had to be brewed, cakes, bread, and bannocks baked, and a supply of smoked fish bought and stored for the grand occasion.

In some districts omens were drawn from the way the wort boiled in the brewing and the way the cakes behaved in the baking. "If the wort biles i' the pot" was an old saying. There was an oatcake baked for each member of the household, and if a cake broke in the baking then death was to be the lot of its owner before the coming year had run its course.
