FLOUR CONSUMPTION

sumption of flour by the American people was 235 pounds per capita, during the crop year just ended it was but 171 pounds. Some authorities take the position that owing to the improved purchasing power the people, they spent their money for more expensive foods, principally meats. But when you consider ing would promote health, wealth and how high meat prices have been, and comfort. how much money has been put into Liberty bonds and war costs, this theory seems untenable.

It would seem more likely that this saving was effected in two ways, first, by use of more vegetables; and second, by greater economy in the use who raised gardens ran way up in the millions The vegetables thus raised were consumed in the homes where they were grown. When enormous new quantities of beans, peas,] potatoes, corn and other food were less need for wheat and other flours.

The campaign for food saving was very effective. Hotels and restaurants had been wasting food most recklessly. The food saving campaign persuaded eating houses not to throw around bread and muffins like waste paper. The public often growled over the skimpiness of the service, but at least a vast amount of needless Consumers resented the imposition by local applications, as they canpeople were educated up to the idea of the folly of throwing away good food from the home table.

In spite of all economies people probably never had more nourishing tion prescribing a uniform basket condition of the The same Greek word is used in both some of which are heavy springers food than during the war. They are for grapes. now shown to have not suffered from it in any way.

Now if these habits of economy and of use of home grown vegetables can be maintainned, it ought to show a decided effect on cost of living as normal conditions are restored.
