"protection or free trade," "the gold white shirt. standard or bi-metalism," or "prohibition or liquor license," etc., were taken up. Some would have said that those debates were commonplace and that people merely repeated ancient arguments, but those questions seemed tremendously vital then.

They formerly got the young men interested by inducing them to join marching battalions. That could not probably be done now. But it would seem as if debates on political subjects were a fine thing to have in schools and clubs, and as if they would incite a large number of students to read the newspapers and form the habit of studying these developments.
