Social Intellectuals Undermine Freedom

The great questions which confronted the American people when 1954 began had not been answered when 1954 ended. Had they been, it would have amounted to a miracle of unprecedented proportions. For they involve, in the international sphere, bitter and emotionally charged conflicts which have been growing and deepening for more than a generation. And here at home, on the domestic front, the American people certainly have not made clear their answer to the greatest question of all—what kind of government they want.

There were achievements during the year—notable achievements. When the shooting war ended in Korea and it became possible to sharply decrease war spending, there were those who feared that a depression or at least a severe recession was inevitable. They believed that our economy was so inextricably tied to war that the transition of even an uneasy peace would be long and painful. That was not the case. It has been pointed out that never in history did a great nation proceed with such a transition in so orderly a fashion.

Indusroy demonstrated its faith in this nation's strength and potential by continuing and ever increasing expansion programs of almost unbelievable scope and cost. The declining purchasing power of the dollar was checked—the direct result of curbs on federal spending. As the year ended, production and consumption were running at enormous levels, and the employment figures reflected that fact.

When then—barring another wold war—have we got to worry about?

The answer is simple. For some 20 years, millions of Americans became conditioned to having government provide more and more of the services that people must provide for themselves if a free system is to be preserved. They became conditioned to the idea of a welfare if a free system is to be preserved. They became conditioned to the idea of a welfare state. And, apparently, they regarded a "little socialism as a good thing.

Obvious consequences of this are found in our national debt and our tax structure—nothing is more expensive than socialism and a welfare state. More subtle and more important consequences are found in a sapping of individual moral fiber, and the undermining of old, eternal ideals of human dignity and freedom and responsibility.

Amercans hate Communism. Yet Communism is nothing but socialism and state capitalism—"do-everything' government—carried to the inevitable end. One of the most distinguished men living recently described the process well. Herbert Hoover said: "In the Iron Curtain states it was the Socialist intellecutals who weakened the freedom of men by desroying free enterprise. Thus they furnished the boarding ladders by which the Communists captured the Ship of State."

Today, as for years past, the attempt to destroy free enterprise in the United Sates continues. Men in high responsible positions, including members of both the political parties, advocate policies and philosophies which would undermine free enterprise in one sphere or another, and which would make the central government ever bigger, ever more powerful, ever more expensive, ever more monopolistic, ever more oppressive.

It was said long ago that any people get the kind of government they deserve. They also get the amount of freedom thy deserve. We Americans are not immune to these truths.

Down the Line with Johnny Bell

So much pleasure costs so little!

There is someone, somewhere, whose whole day would be brightened just by an unexpected telephone call from you. Wherever that special person may be, your Long Distance call can be put through quickly, easily, and at less cost than you might imagine. And right now is the perfect time to do it!

Pulling together!

Long before today's tractor was thought of, the "team" did the heavy work around the farm. And hard-working animals, trained to pull together, were cherished by the farmer. Co-operation was all-important, if any chores were to get done at all. Co-operation is all-important, too, on your party-line telephone. When you think of the other fellow, and try to remember little things like hanging up properly after each call, then service gets better and faster all along the line.
