What will happen to the American people if they continue to swarm into our greatest centers of population? Swallowed up in these teeming masses, their individuality lost, restless as the hurrying ants in some stupendous antheap, what becomes of their interest in the tasks of citizenship and in many cases of their personal character.

Visitors to those teeming hives of population remark on thelavishness and luxury there observed. They say these big cities get more than their share of the nation's wealth. If such ones would venture down the shabby side streets and dingy alleys where masses of people live, many of them with less sun and air than a horse or dog would get in their home town they would obtain a better perspective of real life in such cities.

Said a young man who once departed to seek a visionary fortune in New York city, I am going down to the big show." To which it could have ben replied that when you visit the big show you have to pay the big price. Also you get your toes stepped on in the crowd, you get separated from your friends and then probably have to take a back seat where you can't see much of anything

In a friendly community like ours you have the chance to realize the best possibilities of which you are capable. Do good work in some occupation, and you earn a comfortable living. Show superiority, and doors of opportunity open to you, and the crowd is not so great that you can't squeeze through.

And the intimate relations of a good wholesome town give your friendships that no dollars can buy, and which are better than the luxurious magnificence which the great city showers on a few of its more favored pets.

"I wish to emphasize that there cannot be a simple remedy to effect all that the public has been led, or rather misled, to expect of compulsory automobile insurance," said W. C. Safford, Superintendent of Insurance of Ohio, in a recent address, "and I believe that the public should be educated to abandon the idea of a panacea which will not produce the expected results and which will result in demoralization."

Mr. Stafford considered theargument that compulsory automobile insurance is based on the same principle as workmen's compensation, and should receive the same consideration. Of this, he stated that ". . . the idea is entirely wrong in principle. The fallacy that the victim of an automobile accident occupies a status similiar to that of an injuredworkman and should share in a fund such as workmen's composation, has been responsible for mistaken notions. The relationships of principal and agent and master and servant are recognized principles of contract. and out ofthese grew workmen's compensation. What principle of contract exists between the automobile driverand the pedestrian? What control has an automobile driver over the physical situs for an accident? What compensation does one pay and the other receive?

Another great fallacy,according to Commissioner Safford, is that compulsory automobile insurance would indemnify all those injured He cites cases where the insurance would notbe operative.These include accidents accidents at grade crossings, accident where killed or injured were at fault, accidents caused by horse-drawn vehicles and animals, accidents where negligence cannot be proven and a number of other situations. Clearly these are responsible for a large percentage of all automobile mishaps.

Mr. Safford's arguments are in accord with the opinions of many authorities. What we need is a cure, not a dubious system of indemnity after the damage has been done.

To Open Big Ditch

That the expenditure of approximately $3,000 in re-opening badly clogged portions of Long Marsh ditch would soon reclaim thousands of valuable acres of farming land, is the opinion of experts who have agreed upon this financial outlay.

Because of the fact that a larger acreage will be served in Queen Anne's county than in Caroline $2,000 of the contemplated expense will be paid by the former county and the remaining $1.000 by Caroline.

Long Marsh ditch was constructed before the Civil War by slave labor. Originally it drained in the neighborhood of 50,000 acres of fertle valuable farm land. For about the last thirty years it has gradually been filling up until today it no longerserves the purpose for which it originally was intended.

As a result of the decline of the ditch as a drainage adjunct thousands of acres of land are new idle and beyond reclamation without the opening of the waterway.

Six weeks ago State senator Dudley G. Roe began working on plans to reopen the ditch and an agreement was recently reached between the commissioners of Queen Anne's and Caroline, where by the project will be carried to consumption.
