Poetical.

THE CHEROKEE ROSE.

Come ripple your fleetest,
O rhymes that are meetest,
In praise of the sweetest
Wild blossom that blows.
Though tripping most lightly,
And pattering brightly,
Ye ne'er can sing rightly
The Cherokee rose.

The zephyr that kisses
Its petals hath blisses
That paradise misses
And scraph ne'er knows.
So charming its face is,
I long to change places
With bee that embraces
The Cherokee rose.

In sultry midsummer,
Who would not become a
Luxurious bummer
That merrily goes,
Defying the lances
That noonday advances,
To revel where dances
The Cherokee rose?

Shame on the brown thrushes
That sport in the bushes!
Where sweetest than those—
Were sweeter than those—
If I could sit swinging
Where perfumes are winging,
More worthy my singing
The Cherokee rose.

When shorn fields are dreariful,
And bonnie birds fearful—
When autumn is tearful,
No terror it shows;
No quarter it cravest,
When Boreas ravest,
But dies like the bravest
Sweet Cherokee rose.

Miscellaneous.

ON THE PATH BELOW.

I reached Burton's in the mountains beyond Bristol late in the evening, having, as usual, blundered about the trail. The cabin stood just off the road, and all around it was silent and dark. It has always been a wonder that his dogs did not attack me. He had three, and they were as cross and crabbed as old bears. They came running down the trail to meet me, growling and barking, but as soon as they came up they made friends. They were playing around when I stood in front of the cabin and called:

"Hello! you! Hello! Hello!"

In about a minute a voice answered:

"Who is yer, an' what's wanted?"

"Stranger in search of lodgings."

He seemed to doubt it, for he made no immediate reply. After a long minute I heard a woman arguing:

"I tell you he must be all right. If he wasn't them dogs would hev devoured him!"

"Wall, come in," called the man, and I stumbled along to the cabin to find him in the half open door with his rifle in his hand. My explanations soon satisfied him that I was all right, and he struck a light, piled some blankets in a corner and said:

"Stranger, that's the best lop I kin fix ye off hand. Jist tumble down and doan' worry about nothin'."

I was soon fast asleep, having nothing to keep me awake. Right in the heart of the grim old mountain—among people whose faces I had only glanced at—among men who settle their disputes with knife or bullet—entirely at their mercy and in their power if they wanted to rob or kill, and yet there was no cause to be afraid. When you are the guest of a mountaineer you are safe.

Next morning I found the family to consist of husband, wife and three children. The oldest of the three children was a boy of 12, who had killed a bear and was a dead shot. As soon as I had looked around me I knew that a distillery could be found near by. After breakfast Burton pumped me for a few minutes, sized me up in his mind as "O. K." and said:

"Come up with me and see the boys. And I want to tell you that we've bin expecting visitors the last two days an' we may hev a scare befo' night."

"What sort of visitors?"

"United States chaps arter our still. They've had a spy in yere trying to locate it. We saw him twice yesterday."

There were three other men at the still, which was hidden away in a dark and rugged ravine, approached by a footpath which could be ambushed at every rod. All the corn was "tried" on the men's back over this path, and the kegs of whisky were slung to a pole and carried between two men. The still was perfect, but small, and in the five or six months it had been in operation the men had not made the wages of mechanics. I asked one of them how long since he had had a five dollar bill, and he squinted his eyes, counted his fingers, scratched his head, and finally replied:

"Wall, stranger, you may remember the battle of Stone River?"

"Yes."

"A right smart ago, wasn't it?"

"Yes: twenty-five years ago."

"Wall, jist arter that fight I had a five-dollar bill, and that's the fust and last time."

What money they made by illicit distilling went for boots and shoes, clothing of the plainest kind, tinware, tobacco and tea. One of them had had three pounds of brown sugar in his house within a year. The others had not had an ounce; one had not tasted tea, coffee, sugar, wheat bread or fresh meat (out side of wild meat) for over two years.

The still was about a mile from the house. If any stranger came by the trail one of the dogs was sent up the ravine with a piece of cloth tied to his neck. Half way between the two, as I discovered later on, was another path intersecting. This came out of another ravine, and was used by the men only occasionally. The boy was stationed at this intersection to watch both paths and give an alarm if danger threatened. It was about 11 o'clock in the morning when he came running in and said:

"Spy coming, pop!"

Then an instantaneous and terrible change took place in the bearing of the men. We had been lying about at ease, every man seemingly having a heart full of kindness, but this announcement started a blazing fire in every eye, set every jaw, and I could see desperation in each face. It needed no handwriting on the wall to tell me that the spy would be wiped off the face of the earth without compunction if discovery threatened. Burton beckoned to me, made a signal to the others which they understood, and we climbed up the rugged face of a rock, ran for a quarter of a mile over broken ground which was well wooded, and then suddenly halted at a spot overlooking the second path and high above it. Burton made me a sign as he crouched down beside a large rock, and cautiously approaching I looked down into the ravine and saw a solitary man—the spy. He was coming up the path. If he passed the spot where we were stationed his scent alone would locate the still.

"Click! Click!"

"Good heavens! but you are not going to shoot him!" I whispered to Burton as he cocked his rifle.

He half turned to look at me. His face was as hard set as iron.
