I had an odd conceit;
Sweet William was a bridegroom,
The bride a Marguerite.

And Violet was the bridesmaid,
She combed the Maiden's Hair
With a dainty bit of Cockscomb,
Found in the garden fair.

The priest, good Johnny Jump-up,
A fitting Monk's Hood wore,
And said the rite in silence,
As ne'er was said before.

"Now may you Live-for-ever,"
The guests united said;
Fair Lily, tall and stately,
Just bowed her queenly head.

But Rose went up with blushes,
And kissed the winsome bride;
Here, too, was Bachelor Button,
With Daisy by his side.

When Blue-bell rang for breakfast,
They went in two by two;
How Bouncing Betty hurried,
She had so much to do!

They ate the butter-and-the-Eggs,
The Honey-suckles too,
And then, from golden Buttercups
They sipped the morning dew.

They fanned with Princes' Feathers,
And all were gay, I ween;
"Forget-me-not" here found "Aching Hearts,"
Quoth Lady-in-the-Green.

And some wore Lady-Slippers,
And danced to music fine,
Of Lily-bells-a-swinging,
All in the glad sunshine.

So, from the Morning Glory
Till Four O'clock they stayed;
Dear flowers of the upland,
Sweet blossoms of the glade.

Miscellaneous.

TRAPPED.

It was a lucky day for me when I obtained a position as janitress of a large apartment house, because we had nice rooms rent free, the work was light, and my mother was not compelled to take in sewing as she once did.

Mother was out one night visiting some friends and I was just setting the tea table when the bell rang. I pulled the door open and then stepped into the hall, expecting, of course, that it was my mother.

Two men entered and closed the hall door.

"Gentlemen, whom do you wish to see?" I asked them.

"We don't want to see any one," said one of the men, and stepping toward me, they pushed me back into the room I had just left and locked the door.

I readily divined that they were thieves, who, knowing that I was alone in the house, had entered for the purpose of robbing it. Absurd ideas flashed through my mind about how I should escape and alarm the neighborhood; but all were impracticable; and, in fact, ere I could move or scream, one of the ruffians had stepped forward and grasped my wrists.

"Come, Jack," said he, turning to his companion, "we'll have to tie up this young lady, or she'll give us trouble."

Suiting the action to the word, they proceeded to tie me up in the most scientific manner. They first tied my hands behind me, and then, after placing me in a chair, tied my feet together, passing the spare cord securely around the rungs of the chair.

"Now, lady," said the man addressed as Jack, "will you promise not to scream, or must I gag you?" exhibiting an improvised gag in the shape of a thick wad of cotton and a bandage as he spoke.

The sight of this sufficient. Overcome by terror, I promised to keep a discreet silence.

"Now tell us where the dumb-waiter is, and we will not trouble you any further," said the first speaker.

I accordingly directed them to the kitchen, through which passed the large dumb-waiter, or elevator used for conveying coal, wood, groceries and the like to each successive kitchen from the basement clear up to the roof.

I now knew that they intended to get on the dumb-waiter and draw themselves up, systematically ransacking floor after floor and lowering their plunder to the cellar. This effected without interruption, their escape with their booty would be a comparatively easy matter.

I heard them get into the elevator box and begin to pull themselves up, and then I determined what to do. By a great effort I drew myself on my feet and succeeded in placing the cords binding my hands over the lamp that we used to read by. The flame burnt my hands cruelly, and I nearly fainted with the terrible pain, but I did not allow a moan to escape me, for fear of alarming the villains to the frustation of my plan.

It was not more than a minute before my hands were free, although to me it seemed ages, and my burnt flesh was peeling off in great pieces. I dropped back in my chair, and for a moment sat there completely stunned with pain and gasping for breath. Recovering, I soon freed myself from the chair and untied my feet. I then ran lightly to the elevator shaft and peered up through the darkness toward the roof. The thieves had a light with them, and I saw by its glow that they were nearly to the kitchen door of the uppermost floor. I reached in and caught the rope by which they were pulling themselves up, and with a quick, a hard jerk I had it thoroughly secured by the iron clamp placed at each opening for the purpose.

The clamp was different from those in most elevators. Generally they are smooth, but this had two sharp rows of teeth, and when the rope was firmly gripped between them it was impossible to loosen it without opening the clamp; so you will see how completely I had trapped my robbers, hanging as they did between two floors.

I did not want to hear the horrible curses that they gave vent to upon discovering their position, but hastened to get out of the house and summon help. I succeeded in reaching the front steps and there fainted away in the arms of a gentleman who was just entering.

When I recovered I found myself on a lounge in the young physician's office, with my hands neatly bandaged, and feeling quite comfortable from some soothing application.

Mother was there also, bathing my head and face, and nearly frightened out of her senses at the peril I had undergone.

It seemed that mother had grown tired of seeing the procession, had left her friends to come home, and had arrived just in time to see me fall into the doctor's arms as he was entering the house. At his suggestion she had examined the rooms to learn the cause of my fright, and upon hearing the threats and curses issuing from the elevator, had at once understood the situation and summoned the police.

The robbers were promptly taken into custody, and were subsequently tried, convicted and sentenced to long terms in State prison.

Of course I was made a great heroine, but I still do not think I did any more than my duty in protecting the property of which I had charge.

This all happened several years ago. I have since become the wife of the physician, and reside in the same flat. Although I long ago gave up the position of janitress.

Singular.

An old lady of seventy-five or more met an acquaintance in a Boston horse car, and imparted to her the information that she was intending to start shortly for California. "My only daughter lives out there," added the lady, "
