WON BY PROXY.

"NO, sir, I cannot consent to your marrying my daughter."

"But why not, Mr. Merrill, why not? Have you any reasonable objection to my person—my character?"

"Your person? O no—excepting that you are too confoundedly good looking.—If it had been otherwise, Eva might be a little more docile here."

"But my character, Mr. Merrill, have you any fault to find with that?"

"No, you seem honest enough; I do not suppose that you would steal—that is anything besides my daughter; and I shall take pretty good care that you do not steal her."

"Then what is it sir, may I ask?"

"Eva, Mr. Beldon, has been spoiled and pampered and petted. She does not know how to do a useful thing. What kind of a wife would she make a poor man?"

"But I am not poor. I have a large salary. I could not, of course, give her a carriage quite yet nor a box at the opera, but she would not be obliged to exert herself at all. I shall be perfectly able to keep my wife in the comfortable goods comely, even richly."

"But you may loose your fine salary at any moment."

"I have the confidence of my employers Mr. Merrill; and they are exceedingly kind."

"Well, don't say anything more. I am very decided about this, and I beg that you will drop the subject. I wish you to discontinue your visits to my daughter at once. I shall be very glad to hear that you are prospering in this world, but I cannot give you Eva. The comfort and happiness of my daughters are my first and last considerations."

"But she loves me sir."

"She will get over it; young girls are not reliable. Good morning, Mr. Beldon, I have told you my wish—pray do not oppose it."

The young man seized his hat and quickly withdrew; but as he was passing the parlor door, a little white hand was laid upon his arm, and he was drawn into the room and eagerly questioned by the lovely owner of the aforesaid hand.

"What did he say, Henry, what did he say?"

"He forbade me coming to the house at all, Eva."

She laid her head on his arm and burst into tears. Drawing her closely to him, he talked in low, soothing tones, until suddenly raising her eyes to his, she said, "I cannot give you up, Henry, I will not give you up. If you cannot come to see me, I shall go to see you."

"O, my darling, that will never do."

"Then you are willing to relinquish me so easily?" she asked, drawing herself away from him.

"No, dearest, never, never, but we shall be obliged to resort to stratagem, and I have a friend who will assist me. I must go now, for if your father should find me with you, he would be very angry," and after pressing his line to her's he tore himself away.

William Curtis was seated in his office, hat on and feet resting against the mantle-piece, in regular bachelor fashion, when Henry Beldon entered, looking eager and excited.

"Glad to see you old fellow," exclaimed the former; "but see here what's the matter? You look a little down in the mouth, it appears to me."

"Will. I want your assistance."

"How, where and when?"

"I want you to woo and win a lady for me."

"What's that?"

"Just what I said, exactly."

"But suppose she should be like the fair maiden of olden times, and say, 'Why dost thou not speak for thyself?' You know, Harry, I am not such a bad looking fellow."

"O, it's the fair Eva, is it? Why, what's the matter there, that you do not woo and win her yourself?"

"Her father has forbidden me to come to the house, because I have'n money enough, but he will never object to you, as you are one of fortune's favorites, you know. So I want you to devote yourself to Eva, and give me a chance to meet her when her father thinks she is with you."

"Well, I don't know Henry, it is putting me in a pretty dangerous place, Miss Eva is a very fascinating young lady. However, if your heart is set upon, I'll run the risk. What shall I do first?"

"Go and invite her to ride, then when you get to Meriden's lane, I'll relieve you for a while of your charge."

"Why, Harry, you are better at manœuvering than I imagined; when shall it be?"

"Call upon her to-night, and invite her to ride with you to-morrow afternoon, then I will meet you at the place mentioned."

"All right, but what am I to expect for this friendly service?"

"There's a younger sister coming, Will."

"Well, that's according to taste, you know. Maud is a very pretty girl, and will soon make her debut in society, so you had better have your eyes wide open."

That evening the gentleman called as requested, upon Miss Merrill, and invited her to ride the following day. At breakfast next morning, her father said to her "Eva, I am quite willing that you should encourage Mr. Curtis' attentions, he is a very promising man."

"And has plenty of money," she added, drily; "parents are always willing to encourage the attentions of young men who have a fortune, or are expected to come. Money redeems a multitude of sins. They may drink, game, do anything, if they are only rich. But, pa, suppose I should upset the one-sided calculations by falling in love with a worthless fellow, who has not gold enough to make his way in the world, or perhaps, heaven forbid, a vagrant, or little or no better than one, what would you say to that?"

"Don't look ill-natured, Eva, it really seems great folly."

"I had rather be ill-natured than miserable. Suppose I should elope with a worthless fellow, what would you say?"

"I would say that you deserved a little of the misery which would be your share, if you play at love in a manner so unbecoming a lady. Darling child, nothing will ever induce me to think you can ever act so as to give me cause to blush for my daughter."

The girl rose from the breakfast table and left the room. Her parents exchanged glances, but the subject was not again discussed by them.

Mr. Merrill was sitting in his office when Curtis entered, looking very happy, and with a bright, smiling face, he said, "Mr. Merrill, I have come to ask your consent to my marrying your daughter."

"Why, Curtis, I thought you knew my sentiments on the subject."

"I thought I might hope that you would change your mind, when you knew that I love your daughter, and she loves me."

"Mr. Merrill looked very grave for a moment, but then said: "Well, Curtis, you are young, and I suppose you must have your own way. Take your chance, but I warn you that I think it will be a very foolish one."

"Say, dearest," replied Alice, and his countenance changed to expression of consternation, as he saw the tears which coursed over the sweet face of his wife, "say, dearest, that you will not oppose this marriage, for I know that it will be for the happiness of our child."

"Nay
