From the Saturday Evening Post.

THE BRIDAL DAY.

When the heart has been made to beat with painful emotions—when the breast has been made to heave with the sigh of despondency, and the tear of grief has been found silently trickling down the face of the agonized parent, child, or lover—how sorrowful, yet how instructive the task to call the scattered senses home, and look back to younger days and review the past scenes and incidents of our life. Perhaps some have been the witness of the departure of a revered father to the world of spirits—some with silent grief have been attendant daughters upon a kind and affectionate mother, who was about leaving this world of probation to surrender herself into the hands of her heavenly Maker—how many have wept as they have caught the last sound of their exhausted voice blessing them, and exhorting them to pursue the path of rectitude and virtue—how oft have the solemn sounds from a dying bed knolled in our ears the truth, that we all must die—how oft have we been suddenly alarmed at the sorrowing intelligence of a much loved friend's decease—and ah! how overwhelming has been the shock to be present when the soul of a lover's mistress wings its way to heaven—when you catch the last sigh and feel the last throb of that pulse which beat with so much fervour—these reflections were brought to my mind by the recollection of the following tale:

On Little river was the residence of an English gentleman who left his native country for the purpose of burying in the solitudes of the American wilds, the cause of his unhappy grief—he had lost a fond and affectionate wife, and the memory of her whom he had loved so dearly prayed upon his mind and threatened such serious consequences that his friends after much persuasion induced him to leave his country and take with him his only child, (a daughter of fourteen,) and settle on the shores of the above named stream. Here in this happy seclusion did he watch with parental solicitude o'er the expanding mind of his lovely child—he spent his many leisure hours in teaching her by his precepts, and assisting by his knowledge in all the useful branches of education. Thus employed, both with the improvement of his daughter and the cultivation of his small farm, the excess of his grief gradually wore away. He had the satisfaction to see his child grow up in innocence and worth—he would trace with fond remembrance, (as the big tears stood in his eyes) a strong and striking resemblance to her mother—her form was so delicately moulded, and her eyes so beautifully mild, that she seemed more like a fairy of the imagination than a being of existence. At this interesting period of Mary's life, a circumstance occured that introduced into this quiet family an inmate. She was one day strolling along the shores of the river and admiring the rocky scenery of this place—above her was the remarkable and very romantic cataract of Little river, a rock ten or twelve feet in perpendicular height extended quite across the channel of the river o'er this the whole river pitched its volume of water in one entire sheet upon a bed of rocks below—at the bottom of the perpendicular fall the rocks were curiously excavated be the constant pouring out of the water—the smoothness of the water above its descent, the regularity and beau- of the perpendicular fall, and the craggy towering cliff which impends the whole were indescribably delightful and majestic. Mary had seated herself upon the projection of a rock and was indulging in the reveries of thought. She was comparing the stormy passage of life to the foaming element that came thundering at her feet with the most violent agitation from above, and then camly glided to the ocean of Eternity. At this moment, casting her eyes upwards, she beheld a canoe, guided by one person, glide o'er the perpendicular precipice—a chilling feeling of horror ran through her as she saw the frail bark dashing down the cataract—and overwhelmed by the deluge of waters, it passed from her sight—her nerves were unable to bear longer this shock and sunk down motionless. The canoe directed by a more able and experienced hand than Mary had conceived was seen a little distance emerging from behind the thick shelves of rocks, perfectly poised and manned by the same hardy adventurer who had so boldly dashed down the cataract. Mary upon recovering, looked wildly around her, exclaiming, "he is lost—I saw the waves cover him, and he sunk to rise no more." The stranger knowing the recent sight had shocked her nerves, quietly conducted her to her father, and begged permission that he might be allowed to call on the following day—his request was granted. Mary continued to talk a little wandering until evening; then falling into a calm sleep, she rose next morning with renovated strength and heard thankfully the particulars of the preceding day she learned also, that the stranger obtained permission to visit the house on that day. This to her was a fruitful source of conjecture. She had always been secluded from society, and had been taught by her over-solicitous father not to trust to the protestation of men; notwithstanding this she found herself adjusting with rather more care than usual the different articles of her dress, and when she went down to attend her father in his afternoon walks, he joked her on the coming of the stranger.

As Mary was pointing to her father the place where the canoe had yesterday been hurried o'er the falls, they were joined by their visitor—he congratulated Mary on her recovery, and hoped he should never again be the cause of giving her more alarm—the manners of the stranger were pleasing—he appeared to be about twenty-five years of age, of a lofty and commanding person—his conversation was interesting and instructive, and it seemed to be more particularly directed to Mary. The father was pleased with his society, and invited him at his departure to call again. Visit was renewed upon visit, until Mary's blushing cheek told the secret of her love—so the no less arduous youth showed, by the warmth of his attachment, that his heart was commanded by another. The happy bridal day was fixed, when before the altar of Hymen this happy pair were to sacrifice for better or for worse.—But, who can stay the shaft of death, or resist the power of disease, or the influence of affliction? Not one. Mary had inherited from the mother an incurable malady—her disease was of so deceptive a kind, that one time she seemed to enjoy perfect health, while at another she was apparently in the lowest stage of consumption. As the day drew nigh that was to unite her to the man she loved, this change in the character of Mary's complaint assumed a more dangerous appearance than formerly—she became languid and enfeebled, and was carried to bed pale, exhausted—her faithful lover hung o'er her, and ministered to her wants; he watched beside her with anguished heart and harrowed feelings—now could his countenance be seen brightening with hope and joy when he saw the hectic glow upon her pallid cheek; but when the blushing rose gave way to the white lilly, then would his heart sink within him. Let us draw near this bed of sickness and contemplate the dying scene. "Father" exclaimed the angelic girl, "I go to meet the bridegroom in Heaven—he came when we least expected—the summons was delivered, and I trust I have had my lamp trimmed and burning. Weep not, expected partner of my life, in this world, there are many trials and tribulations—I love, and respect you, and with my dying lips I would point to Heaven and exhort you to gain admittance through your redeemer. Farewell, ye who have collected this day to see the solemnization of my marriage—I leave you in the flower and bloom of my youth, and instead of seeing me sacrifice at the alter of Hymen, you will find me gone before the judgment seat of Heaven, and my poor body clothed in its winding sheets. Farewell, my disconsolate parent—draw near that I may kiss you once more—and you, my affianced bridegroom, approach, that I may take a last look this side of the grave—I go—May Heaven bless you all," were her last dying words. PAUL.
