Taxation.

The object of all good government is the good of the governed: protection to their lives, liberties and property. Every citizen, from poorest to richest, has a right to this protection. In order, however, to secure the perfect working of any system of government, expenses—oftentimes of considerable magnitude—must be incurred. And to meet these expenses taxation becomes necessary. To levy upon and collect from the people certain stated sums for the support of the government is the problem requiring a solution. The proper solution of this problem requires the exercise of the highest order of statesmanship and a thorough application of the truest principles of political economy. A system of taxation should be so devised and arranged as to produce the requisite revenue with as little burden as possible to the people at large. The immense revenues needed to carry on the national government are so acquired that every citizen contributes toward them, yet if you were to stop a laborer in our streets and ask him how much his annual payment of tax for the support of the United States government amounted to, he would laughingly reply, "to nothing—I do not pay anything." At the same time not a week goes by without his special contribution toward that tax. Every pound of sugar or coffee bought by him embodies in its purchase a contribution to the revenues of the United States. The only difference is that the government collects from the merchant upon the article in bulk when it is first taken from the custom house and the merchant subsequently gets it back when he sells it to his customers. Thus every citizen pays a part and hardly ever thinks about it or knows how much it is. Like the dust of the earth it settles upon all and is readily brushed off.

In order, however, that this may not become burdensome or work injustice to the poor man it is the part of wise statesmanship to consider another class of taxes and other fields of revenue—namely, those afforded by direct taxation of capital. To the capitalist the government affords especial privileges and peculiar protection not exacted or required by those who have no capital. Every dollar of treasure becomes an object which asks for and receives the protecting care of the government. What would money be worth if its possessor held it only by the tenure of a bandit's pleasure? Capital through all the ramifications of its unresting energies or in the quiet hoardings of its vaults has ever thrown around it the sheltering arms of the government. Its entire value depends upon the absolute certainty and security of this protection. And gold dust would be as worthless as the sand were it liable to the rude and constant seizure and appropriation of others than the legal owner. But wherein does this protection consist and what does it mean? It consists in the powerful safeguard thrown around it by millions of law abiding citizens who are ready to lay down their lives for the protection of life, liberty and property; it means the sweating brows and tired muscles of thousands as they dig the mines or cultivate the fields for capital; or it means the very heart's blood of those thousands as they face death upon the field of battle. Law, order, good government is the first and greatest treasure of the capitalist, and for all this capital should pay. It becomes then a cardinal point in every well adjusted system of revenue that capital should in all its forms and in every character of its investments be properly required to contribute its quota to the relief of the laborer from taxation. Instead of meeting this obligation in the proper spirit it is two frequently the case that every dodge and shelter is made use of by the capitalist to avoid a proper contribution to the common burden of taxation. This subject does demand the vigilant scrutiny of our law-makers. The investments of capital should be diligently sought for and when found should be made to contribute their part to the general welfare. Notably among investments which thus far have escaped taxation are mortgages in this State. It becomes the duty of our legislators to inquire into this matter and see that justice is meted out. The capitalist should be taxed upon every investment. Why not? As Democrats we hold to this doctrine.

THE gifts are pouring in upon the family of the late President. Taking together his large life insurance policies, his real estate in Mentor and Washington, his personal property, and the subscriptions to the fund raised for him, which already are over $300,000 and probably will reach upward of $400,000, Mrs. Garfield will doubtless have at her disposal over half a million dollars. As the retired life to which her instincts and her affliction alike prompt her will not expend even the annual interest of this sum, should Congress continue to her the salary of her husband as President through his term, she will doubtless have, four years hence, at least $700,000; and her five children will probably inherit independent fortunes of $150,000 each, in case they should all live to inherit. In addition, the opportunities thrown open to the children of a President to easily acquire fame and fortune are illustrated by the cases of U. S. Grant, Jr., Col. F. D. Grant, and Secretary of War Lincoln.

THE remains of President Garfield were Monday committed to the grave near Cleveland, Ohio, amid such demonstrations of public grief as were never before witnessed on this continent. It is estimated that over two hundred and fifty thousand persons gathered in the vicinity of the pavilion in which the burial casket was deposited, and although scarcely one in a hundred could get near enough to hear what was said or to participate in the services, yet the vast throng stood a burning sun for two hours while the requiems were sung, the prayers said and the eulogies pronounced. Probably fifty thousand persons followed the funeral procession to Lakeview Cemetry, (four miles distant from the park in which the services were held,) although only a small portion of them could possibly expect to see any of the incidents of the burial.

THE Methodist Episcopal congregation of a Pennsylvania town entertain pronounced views on the subject of Guiteau's crime and do not hesitate to make them public. On Sunday they adopted a series of resolutions more or less original and striking in their sentiments, one of them embodying the assertion "that the assassination was the most henious crime committed since the crucifixion of Christ, and in comparison with Guiteau Judas Iscariot was a gentleman." There have been in the past some attempts at apologizing for our explaining the crime of Judas, but heretofore he has not received much countenance from Christian people. It is Judas' misfortune that he is not alive to appreciate the vindication.

LIFE'S RACE WELL RUN.

THE LAST RITES AT CLEVELAND—A VAST OUT-POURING OF PEOPLE—IMPOSING FUNERAL CEREMONIES—MILITARY AND CIVIC SOCIETIES IN LINE.

CLEVELAND, Sept. 26.—In the early part of the morning the sky was cloudy but by 8 o'clock the heavens were clear and the day bade fair to be all that could be desired, excepting that it was extremely warm. The city is much overcrowded, all the hotels being overrun with guests, and notwithstanding the hospitalities which have been extended by the residents, many find great difficulty in obtaining meals or lodgings.

AT THE PAVILION.

Promptly at half-past ten o'clock the ceremonies at the pavilion began. The immediate members of the family and near relatives and friends took seats about the casket, and at each corner was stationed a member of the Cleveland Grays, each of whom stood like a statue during the entire services. Dr. J. P. Robinson, president of ceremonies, announced that the exercises would open with the singing by the Cleveland Vocal Society of the "Funeral Hymn" by Beethoven.

After the singing of the hymn portions of Scripture were read by the Rev. Bishop Bedell, of the Episcopal Diocese of Ohio, commencing with the 14th chapter of the Book of Job. Rev. Ross C. Houghton, pastor of the First Methodist Episcopal Church, offered prayer.

The Vocal Society then sang as follows: "My life I but from Thee inherit."

FUNERAL ORATION.

Rev. Isaac Errett, of Cincinnati, then delivered an eloquent address, taking for his text the following: "And the archers shot King Josiah, and the King said to his servants, bear me away, for I am sore wounded,"&c.

He said: "There was never a mourning in all the world like unto this mourning. I am not speaking extravagantly when I say this, for I am told it is the result of calculation carefully made from such data as are in possession that certainly not less than three hundred millions of the human race share in the sadness and the lamentations and sorrow and mourning that belong to this occasion here to-day. It is a chill shadow of a fearful calamity that has extended itself into every home in all this land and into every heart, and that has projected itself over vast seas and oceans into distant lands and awakened the sincerest and profoundest sympathy with us in the hearts of the good people of the nations and among all people. It is worth while, my friends, to pause a moment and to ask why this is. It is doubtless attributable in part to the wondrous triumphs of science and art within the present century, by means of which time and space have been so far conquered that nations once far distant and necessarily alienated from each other are brought into close communication, and the various ties of commerce and of social and religious interest bring them into contact of fellowship that could not have been known in former times. It is likewise unquestionably partly due to the fact that this nation of ours has grown to such wondrous might and power before the whole earth, and which is in fact the hope of the world in all that relates to the highest civilization, that sympathy with this nation and respect for this great power leads to these offerings of condolence and expressions of sympathy and grief from the various nations of the earth because they have learned to respect us, and recognize that the nation is stricken in the fatal blow that has taken away our President from us. And yet this will be no means account for this marvelous and world-wide sympathy of which we are speaking. Yet it cannot by attributed to mere intellectual greatness, for there have been other and there are other great men; and acknowledging all that the most enthusiastic heart could claim for our beloved leader, it is but fair to say that there have been more eminent educators, there have been greater soldiers, there have been more skillful, experienced and powerful legislators and leaders of mighty parties and political forces. There is no one department in which he has won eminence where the world may not point to others who attained higher and more intellectual greatness. It might not be considered more righteously here than in many other cases, yet perhaps it is rare in the history of nations that any one may combine so much of excellence in all those various departments, and as an educator, a lawyer, a legislator, a soldier, a party chieftain and ruler have done so well, so thoroughly well, in all departments, and brought out such successful results as to inspire confidence and command respect and approval in every path of life in which he has walked, and in every department of public activity which he has occupied. Yet I think when we come to a proper estimate of his character and seek after the secret of this world-wide sympathy and affection, we shall find it rather in the richness and integrity of his moral nature, in that sincerity, in that transparent honesty, in that truthfulness in which lie the basis for everything of greatness to which we do honor to-day.

"The great lesson to which I desire to call your attention can be expressed in a few words. James A. Garfield went through his whole public life without surrendering for a single moment his Christian integrity, his moral integrity or his love for the spiritual. Coming into the exciting conflicts of political life with a nature as capable as any of feeling the force of every temptation; with temptation to unholy ambition; with unlawful prize within his reach; with ever inducement to surrender all his religious faith, and not merely as a successful man of the word, from first to last he he has manfully adhered to his religious convictions, and found the more praise, and gathers in his death all the pure inspiration of the hope of everlasting life."

Dr. Errett was listened to with close and earnest attention. He spoke for forty minutes and when he closed a hush for a moment hung over the vast audience.

The Rev. Jabez Hall then read Gen. Garfield's favorite hymn, which was beautifully sung by the vocal society. The hymn begins "Ho, reapers of life's harvest, why stand with rusted blade?"

At 11.45 o'clock Dr. Charles S. Pomeroy delivered the final prayer and benediction. There were then a few moments of commotion and of preparation. The Washington marine Band played "Nearer, My God, to Thee."

MOVEMENT OF THE PROCESSION.

The funeral procession moved from Monumental Park at five minutes before 12. The time occupied in moving the casket from the pavilion to the funeral car was about fifteen minutes. A corps of United States marines from the United States steamer Michigan formed parallel lines from the east side of the pavilion to the east entrance to the park, through which the casket was borne on the shoulders of the United States artillerymen under command of Lieut. Weaver, second United States artillery, to the funeral car, followed by the mourners, who took seats in the carriages. "Grandma" Garfield bore the services remarkably well, as did also the widow of the President. The only incident which occurred at the pavilion was the request of "Grandma" Garfield for a drink of water. Many persons constructed this as an indication that the old lady was faint, but such was not the case. No one except the family, members of the several committees and distinguished guests were admitted within the gates of the park. The military presented a magnificent appearance. The column was headed by the veteran volunteer organization, the Boston Fusiliers, who traveled from Massachusetts to pay a last tribute to their deceased comrade. They were followed by companies B and F, seventy-fourth regiment N. G., S. N. Y., the Buffalo City Guard Cadets, who were much admired, and the Buffalo City Guard. Next came the famous United States Barracks Band, of Columbus, followed by the Governor's Guard, a magnificent and finely proportioned body of men. The Toledo Cadets came next, followed by the Detroit Infantry and the Washington Infantry of Pittsburg. The Gatling gun and the Cleveland Light Artillery followed in platoon front. The order of the procession was practically the same as indicated in last night's report, excepting that the Columbia Commandery of Knights Templar of Washington marched with the guard of honor and pall-bearers in the division having charge of the funeral car. The six miles of Euclid avenue, through which the procession passed, were appropriately draped in a manner becoming the occasion. The designs were varied and handsomely and tastefully arranged. Lifesize pictures of the dead President were hung in front of many of the mansions along the avenue, draped with the national colors, entwined with black crape, relieved by festoons of white. In the lawns in front of a large number of the residences tasteful designs were erected. Broken shafts, surrounded with smilax, massive crosses, shields, anchors, harps and crowns were seen on every hand, elaborately decorated with evergreens and flowers suitable for mourning designs. On Prospect street, second in beauty to Euclid avenue only, and on the other streets leading to the cemetery there was the same universal expression of mourning by the residents. Elegant silk flags trimmed with black hung from many a staff, and broad bands of crape were stretched from roof to foundation of many of the residences. Every available place for witnessing the funeral line on Euclid avenue was utilized. Stands erected on all the vacant lots were let out at high prices. Private lawns were occupied by raised platforms, and the roofs and every portice had as many chairs as could be crowded upon them. The Ashtabula battery, which was stationed along the line of march, divided into two sections three miles apart, fired minute guns as the procession passed. A succession of heavy showers so delayed the funeral that the line had to be broken before it reached the cemetery, and forming in files on either side of the avenue for nearly three miles the military and civic societies made way for the funeral car. The State militia were stationed at the entrance to the cemetery and on each side of the driveways leading to the vault, where Mrs. Garfield's request, it was decided to place the remains.

LAID TO REST.

The steps to the vault were carpeted with flowers, and on both sides of the entry were anchors of tuberoses and a cross of white smilax, and evergreen festooned above. A heavy black canopy was stretched over the steps from which the exercises were to be conducted. At 3.30 o'clock the procession entered the gateway, which was arched over with black, with appropriate inscriptions. On the Keystone were the words "Come to rest," on one side were the words "Lay him to rest whom we have learned to love;" on the other "Lay him to rest whom we have learned to trust." A massive cross of evergreens issued from the centre of the arch The United States Marine Band, continuing the mournful strains it had kept up during the entire march, entered first; then came the Forest City Troops of Cleveland, who were the escort of the President to his inauguration. Behind them came the funeral carriage with its escort of 12 United States artillerymen, followed by a battalion of Knights Templars and the Cleveland Greys.

The mourners' carriages and those containing the guard of honor comprised all of the procession that entered the grounds. The cavalry halted at the vault and drew up in line facing it, with sabres pointed. The car drew up in front, with the mourners' carriages and those of the cabinet behind. The band played "Nearer, my God, to Thee." As the military escort lifted the coffin from the car and carried it into the vault the local committee of réception, Secretary Blaine, Marshal Henry and one or two personal friends stood at each side of the entrance. None of the President's family except two of the boys left the carriage, and during the exercises, which occupied less than a half hour, Dr. J. P. Robinson, as president of the day, opened the exercises by introducing Rev J. H. Jones, chaplain of the Forty-second Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, which Gen. Garfield commanded. Chaplain Jones spoke at considerable length of his old comrade in arms.

The Latin ode from Horace was then sung by the United German Singing Society. Another hymn was sung by the German vocal societies of Cleveland. The exercises closed with the benediction by President Hinsdale, of Hiram College. Re-entering their carriages, the mourners drove hurriedly back to the city to avoid another shower, which was threatened. The Masonic escort left the cemetery in the same order in which they entered it, and kept in line until the catafalque was reached, where they were dismissed. Gen. Smith, adjutant-general of the State, will furnish a guard as long as the body remains in the vault. The sexton thinks it will be but a few days before the final interment takes place.

Mrs. Garfield, while at the cemetery yesterday, said she did not think that there was sufficient time to prepare the grave for the interment, and the casket was therefore placed in a vault. At the cemetery at six o'clock this morning there 5,000 people on the grounds. At ten o'clock the Fourteenth Regiment, Ohio National Guards, 500 in number, arrived and cleared the grounds of all strangers, and no one was allowed to enter until the funeral party arrived at the vault. The members of company D, Fourteenth Regiment, were engaged in cutting cedars, and a number of ladies were trimming the dias and draping the vault with deep black crape.

THE WORK OF LOVING HANDS.

The dias used to lay the coffin on in the vault is covered with velvet trimmed with black broadcloth and deep black fringe. At the head of the vault in the background, right over the head of the coffin, hangs a large floral wreath given to Mrs. Garfield. The pathway from the carriage-way where the cortege stopped into the vault was covered with cedar; on the top of this were scattered white immortelles, tube roses, etc. Right in front of the gate at the entrance to the vault was spread large pieces of carpet covered with tuberoses and other white flowers. This was covered over with a canopy of deep black broadcloth. Just outside the vault at the gate there was a cross of elegant flowers, with the motto, "Dead, but not Forgotten." It was from the Bolivian delegation.

Secretary Evarts was among the distinguished guests at the catafalque, accompanying ex-President and Mrs. Hayes. The first section of the funeral train, on the return trip to Washington, started from Euclid avenue at 6.03 o'clock this evening with all the members of the cabinet excepting Secretary Blaine on board. During the hours set for the obsequies memorial services were held in every locality in Ohio.

PRECAUTIONS AGAINST POSSIBLE DANGER.

At Mrs. Garfield's suggestion the casket containing the body of the late President will be inclosed in an iron cage, then a cement wall be built around it of sufficient strength to resist all attempts to remove the body, and of dimensions large enough to form the base of the proposed monument. The mayor of the city has detailed a police force to be on duty continuously until the final interment. It is estimated that 250,000 people were on the streets to-day, and that from 100,000 to 150,000 of these were strangers. Some of the adjacent towns were almost depopulated.
