life we know and see, and after all, what a shore span it is? Why should we crowd or jostle each other on the way? Why plant a thorn where a rose would blossom as well? I think if we had closed eyelids and hands folded over some leads in troubled ways, and this world at best is ear. And so, gentle reader, I say, why crowd and wound on the way? 'Tis a short span We are here today, we may be gone tomorrow. Great or small, rich or poor, all must own the feriority of human years, the magnitude of eter-nity—the hurry and worry of one, the great, how diligently, and unceasingly, with what keen interest and pleasure we strive for these fleeting bbles lure us on and on with magic wand until we forget we are only pilgrims, shaped for nobler ends, destined for a fairer home, frail human barques launched to test their ability for the cruise. When we see a tiny, snowy casket, emblematical of the purity and innocence sleeping within, hushed to eternal slumber ere it had waked to the meaning of life, we can but think it were sweeter and happier far to lay down the burden of life in the early morning while the dew of unsulfied purity is still fresh on the brow; ere the blighting heat of the noonday sun has had power to wither the fair, sweet flower; sweeter and happier far to close the eyes in that
