"MUCH YET REMAINS UNSUNG."

For the Cambridge Chronicle.

LINES

To the memory of Miss Isabella E. Steele, fourth daughter of the late James Steele, of Annapolis, who departed this life on the 6th of August, of consumption, after an illness of eight months, which she bore with the most unexampled patience and submissive resignation. She was one of those rare specimens of excellence, which the Almighty sometimes exhibits for a short season, before he hastens to "make them up among his jewels." She possessed talents of no common order—her mind was rapid in its conceptions as it was accurate and penetrating in its judgement of things, and with these qualities was associated rectitude of feeling which did her the highest honor. Flattered, caressed, loved, and admired, as she justly was, few escape from the dangers of the world as she did, and it only remained to perfect and develope, by a long and trying illness, the Christian virtues and graces which had already taken root. She was aware that her "earthly house was dissolving," and her days of sickness and seclusion, were passed in preparation for the event she expected.

That one so young, so beautiful, so accomplished, so fitted to impart and enjoy both social and domestic happiness, should be thus early taken away, is one of those mysteries in the Divine decrees, before which we must bow in silence.

Dear Isabella! could our grief,
Recall thee from the realms of bliss;
Would'st thou not blame the sinful tears
That placed thee in a world like this?

A world where all that met thine eye,
Seem'd good, and fair, and pure and bright;
But now from scenes of purest joy,
How gross must meet thy sainted sight.

And oh! how bright thy soft eye shone,
When other's pleasures met thine ear;
How oft at sorrows not thine own,
It drop'd the sympathetic tear.

For thou wert all that human pride,
Could wish its cherish'd hope to prove,
So good, and beautiful beside—
So every thing, the heart should love.

The drew-drop glistening on the leaf,
Was not so pure, so bright as thou;
But oh! how vain the useless grief,
That loves to paint thy virtues now.

For thou art gone, and though 'tis sin,
To wish thee in this world of care;
How can we go, where thou hast been,
Nor weep to find thou art not there.

How can we see the harp that once
Thy fingers past so lightly o'er,
And turn away nor weep to think
That they shall wake its tones no more.

And see the speaking canvass glow,
With hues and smiles so like thine own;
And tell the tears, they must not flow,
That Isabella! thou art gone.

Let memory forget to tell,
Of all thy beauty, grace, and truth;
Then bid our hearts forget to dwell,
Upon thy innocence and youth.

But whilst remembrance backward turns
To blasted hopes to both so dear;
My rebel heart still weeps and mourns,
That thou hast left thy sister here.

Dear Isabella, could our grief,
Recall thee from the realms of bliss;
Would'st thou not blame the sinful tears,
That placed thee in a world like this?

THE MISCELLANIST.

EDWARD SPENSER.

The following character of the poet Spencer, is taken from the last number of the Edinburg Review.

"SPENSER was steeped in romance. He was the prince of magicians, and held the keys which unlocked enchanted doors. All the fantastic illusions of the brain belonged to him—the dreamer's secrets, the madman's visions, the poet's golden hopes. He threw a rainbow across the heaven of poetry, at a time when all seemed dark and unpromising. He was the very genius of personification: and yet his imagination was less exerted than his fancy. His spirit was idle, dreaming, and voluptuous. He seems as though he had slumbered through summer evenings, in caves or forests, by Mulla's stream or the murmuring ocean. Giants & dwarfs, fairies and knights, and queens, rose up at the waving of his charming rod.—There was no meagreness in his fancy, no poverty in his details. His invention was without limit. He drew up shape after shape, scene after scene, castle and lake, woods and caverns, monstrous anomalies and beautiful impossibilities, from the unfathomable depths of his mind. There is a prodigality and a consciousness of wealth about his creations, which reminds one of the dash and sweep of Ruben's pencil, but in other respects, his genius differed materially from that of the celebrated Fleming. In coloring they are somewhat alike, and in the "Masque of Cupid," some of the figures even claim an affinity to the artist's shapes. But, generally speaking, Spenser was more etherial and refined. Rubens was a decided painter of flesh and blood. He belonged to earth, and should never have aspired to heaven. His men were, indeed, sometimes chivalrous and intellectual (his beasts were grand and matchless!) but his women were essentially of clay, and of a very homely fashion. Spenser sketched with more precision, and infinitely more delicacy. He had not the flush and fever of coloring which lighted up the productions of the other; but his genius was more spiritualized; his fancy traversed a loftier eminence, and loved to wander in remoter haunts. The brain of the one was like an ocean, casting up at a single effort the most common and extraordinary shapes; while the poet had a wilderness of fancy, from whose silent glades and haunted depths stole forth the airiest fictions of romance. The nymphs of Spenser are decidedly different from those of the painter; and and his sylvans have neither the hideous looks of Poussin's carnal satyrs, nor that vinous spirit which flushes and gives life to the reeling Bacchanalians of Rubens.

The silent Woman.—Madam Reguir, the wife of a law officer at Versailles, while talking in the presence of a numerous party, dropped some remarks which were out of place, though not very important. Her husband reprimanded her before the whole company, saying, "silence, Madam, you are a fool!" She lived 30 years afterwards, and never uttered a word even to her children! A pretended theft was committed in her presence, in the hope of taking her by surprise, but without effect, and nothing could induce her to speak. When her consent was requisite for the marriage of any of her children, she bowed her head and signed the contract.

Heat.—The year 1000 was so hot and dry, that in Germany the pools of water disappeared, and the fish being left to putrify in the mud, bred a pestilence.

In 1022, the heat was so excessive, that both men and cattle were struck dead.

In 1130, the earth yawned with drought.—Springs and rivers disappeared; and even the Rhine was dried up in Alsace.

RECEIPTS.

To Farmers.—A gentleman of this city has informed us that he used what are called Sponge Boots, for the preservation of his horses' feet, which have proven of the greatest service to the animal. Most persons have had cause to complain of the diseases which occur in the feet of their most valued horses, and it is believed they are principally occasioned by the dryness of the hoof. While in the stable, horses are generally surrounded with dry litter or stand on the dry floor. These Boots are made of sponge, and fitted on the horses' feet, are wet with soft water every ten or twelve hours. Our informant recommends them to all owners of horses with confidence. We understand they are sold by a person in Boston, who has obtained a patent for them.—Freeman's Journal.

A new Receipt for preserving Cucumbers.—Place them in a tub, and pour upon them fresh water, boiling hot; pour the water off when cold; and repeat the process of scalding. After the water, cold is poured off the second time, pour upon them boiling vinegar; and let the whole remain for after use; when the cucumbers will be found firm, crispy, and of the finest green.

Cure for the cholera morbus.—Take a soft cork, and burn it thoroughly in the fire; when it ceases to blaze, mix it up on a plate with a little milk and water, or any thing more agreeable to the palate, and repeat the dose till the disorder ceases; which it commonly does on the second or third administration of the remedy, the acidity of the stomach is immediately corrected, and the effect instantaneous.

Dysentery.—Doct. Baker, a physician of eminence, at Bladensburg, details at length, in the National Intelligencer, his mode of treating the Dysentery, in which he has been very successful. The method followed by him is the use of cold ice water thrown up into the bowels every half hour, together with the usual remedies applied in that fatal disease.

Cure for the Whooping Cough.—One teaspoonful of castor oil mixed with a teaspoonful of molasses—one or two teaspoonsful of this mixture to be given whenever the patient coughs, or as often as the case requires.

A cure for the Croup.—Take an equal portion of pulverised alum and honey (say a table spoonful of each,) mix well and give a teaspoonfull every two or three minutes till it operates as an emetic, which it will do in a few minutes.

Bugs and Fleas.—Sprinkle or wash the rooms and bed-rooms with common salt and water, and these troublesome insects will entirely disappear.

An Irishman on board the Lady Robert packet, when she was on the point of foundering, being desired to come on deck, as the vessel was going down, replied that he had no wish to go on deck to see himself drowned!
