THE BOUQUET.

"MUCH YET REMAINS UNSUNG."

THE MEETING.

We met and only met,
Ere doom'd by fate to sever;
But ah! I can forget
That meeting with thee never!
Thy locks of auburn hue,
On wanton zephyrs straying;
Thine eyes of liquid blue,
Where light of soul was playing;
Thy voice whose dulcet thrill,
Awak'd such sweet emotion,
I seem to hear it still,
Though far upon the ocean;
'Twas these that charmed me then,
When first and last I met thee;
We may not meet again,
But ne'er can I forget thee.

'Twas evening when we met,
By Arno's rippling billow—
(In dreams I see thee yet
Whene'er I press my pillow;)
It was a lovely night,
The balmy breeze was sighing,
And heaven's sweetest light
On tower and stream was lying:
When in some thicket's shade
His vows the lover's telling,
Like breast of listening maid,
The playful waves were swelling—
We met—and only met
Ere doom'd by fate to sever;
But ah! I can forget
That meeting with thee never!

THE MISCELLANIST.

THE WEDDING.

It was a fresh and balmy morning in the delightful month of May, and nature seemed to have forgotten the ravages of winter and smiled like a young bride, decorated in the blooms of youth &beauty & waiting towelcome the embrace ofsummer. The meadows were gay with luxuriant verdure;the flowers hailed the genial influence of the reviving season, and loaded the air with sweets; & the young birds participating in the general joy, mingled their songs with the voice of the gentle zephyrs. But the beauty of nature was forgotten—the song of birds unheard —for Lucy Brooks was to be married that day, and every head in Alesbury was full of the important subject. The girls in merry groups, might be seen at every porch, discussing the various items of arrangement, and making their combined preparations for the scene,forgetful of the hour of dinner, and here and there a straggling gallant reconnoitered the grounds to see how things were going forward; or culled by a favourite fair one a bunch of pretty flowers to decorate her hair. It seemed as though all the world fancies of happiness, was that morning summed up in the glorious thought of outrivalling in gaiety the gayest.

The bride—a pretty girl of seventeen, proud of the noise and bustle she was making in the village, her fine wedding dress all ready, and a bride's maid at her nod, perfectly satisfied with herself and with every body else, waited with little apparent anxiety for time to bring the appointed hour. The bright dreams of a holliday life were all before her.

Lucy had always been on more than one account, the admiration of the gay ones of the village. She was of a light airy form, and the fine proportions of her person, and the attractive beauty of her face were always displayed to the best possible advantage. There was a peculiar neatness ever remarked in her dress; every thing about her was becoming, a word which signifies much, and it was often said that Lucy would make a delightful wife; she was so smart, so genteel and with all so perfectly economical—a consideration of vast weight among the old fashioned people particularly, though the young, even in those days seemed disposed to attach rather less consequence to it.

The mornings preparation was succeeded by the evening's gathering; and before the sun had gone behind the high mountains that girdled the western horizon, the rural home of farmer Brooks, presented a spectacle that would have made a cold heart warm, and even age feel young again. The formal ceremonies of fashionable cities had not yet broken in upon the simplicity of early customs; and more than a score of pretty girls in white, crowned with flowers and decorated with green, sported on the grass before the door; the bride herself in the midst of them; and each with a gallant at her side; the more aged amused themselves by crowding the door and windows, and looking on the sport; while all within was preparation for the wedding supper.

Many an eye then turned and turned again to the young couple, whose hearts and hands were now to be joined indissolubly. She was a beautiful bride, and her young intended husband eyed her with a triumphant look of pride. He loved her because she was beautiful; because he thought her the prettiest in the village; because she was young and lively, and admired. And though still she made many an effect to be coy, and tried to put on a care-for-nobody kind of a look, a truant glance often strayed towards him, which plainly told, that even if she did not admire especially his manly form,and frank and open manner, she at least loved him because he loved her.

When the all important hour had at ength arrived, the young people were called in and the worthy squire putting onhis spectacles performed the ceremony with all the gravity imaginable, and with a dexterity and promptness, withal, that was doubtless sharpened by the savoury smell of sundry roasted ducks and turkeys, which came in cheeringly from the adjoining apartment; the pretty bride and her chosen consort were pronounced man and wife; their hands and lips were joined and the mutual promises extorted without any unnecessary circumlocution; no fainting; no tears, no whimpering; a glorious kissing followed; and then forthwith the supper; as important a matter, in the estimation of the cool and calculating among the company as any other.

I shall leave them there for the present; I never dare follow much further the course of things on such occasions; and at a single period pass to the counterpart of the story.

I rode a year afterwards, by a prettily situated farm house, half secluded from view by a cluster of venerable oaks; it was the residence of Lucy and her husband; and the strong propensity I felt to see my old friend, induced me to call a moment. I found her in the midst of business; though not busy; she was a wife now; and she had fallen into that most fatal error, carelessness of appearance. The floor was strewed with rubbish; every thing was out of place; and she appeared perfectly slovenly in her person; and when I gazed on her I could not but recall to mind the pretty, neat sprightly girl that won Joe Miller's affections, and contrast her appearance with the same pretty girl, now Joe Miller's wife. She was but a year older; yet ten years less attractive; I would have given my eyes to have kissed her once; but the enchantment was gone. I wondered if her husband thought so.

I said Lucy had fallen into a sad error and she is not the only one which has fallen into the same. Her days of courtship over; the first young dream of love ended; married and settled down in life, she had forgotten that the charms that attract love in the first instance are necessary to retain it; she thought as she had won a husband, it was not necessary to practise any of the means by which she won him, to secure his affections.

I had been sitting but a few minutes when Joe came in, and welcomed me in his frank and cordial manner; but I saw there was a cloud upon his brow; that he felt hurt. He looked round at the wild confusion that reigned in the room, and then at her—"Lucy," said he mildly, "I wish you would put things in little order I do dislike such confusion." She colored, and leaving her seat, flirted off in a pet. Joe looked after her as she slammed the door, and gave a deep sigh, that seemed so say—Alas poor Joe Miller! and from my heart I could have responded it.

The young couple had set out in life with fine prospects. Joe was an industrious, sensible, good hearted fellow, as one in a hundred; and Lucy was a sweet girl; she is still pretty; but that very habit of carlessness in dress and mismanagement in her house, has lost her a world of pleasure and satisfaction. And I have even heard it said that she and her husband live unhappily together.

COLOMBIAN FLEET.

SAILING OF THE EXPEDITION.

A very short time will, in all probability, develope news of much interest respecting the operations of the combined forces of the Republics of South America. All accounts agree, that the Island of Cuba, from its proximity to the republics and the resources which it commands at all seasons to inflict serious injury to the prosperity of the free states, is the meditated point of attack; and that the approaching summer cannot pass without presenting the spectacle of all the assailable points being in possession of the republican arms. The following extract of a letter from Vera Cruz, gives some information upon this subject not heretofore published.

"The Contadar (pay master) of the frigate Libertad informed me of very agreable piece of news which he learnt on board of his B. M. Corvette Silla, which anchored in our port yesterday. At his departure from Carthagena, Colombia, an expedition of 12,000 men commanded by the captain general Burmsdez, was on the point of setting sale for the Island of Cuba. I could not miss this opportunity of communicating to you this important news, announced by the commandant of the Corvette to the capt. of the Libertad.

This information is in some degree confirmed by the subjoined article from the Norfolk Beacon of March 1, which if true shows that the heavy armed part of the Colombian squadron is already at sea and near to the point of its destination. The 12,000 men to be furnised Mexico had already concentrated, and were merely awaiting the arrival of transports.

From the Norfolk Beacon.

Captain Silsby, of the Brig William, arrived here yesterday, from Falmouth (Jam.) reports having fallen in with on the 13th inst. in the Gulph Passage, and remained in company for three days, with a Colombian fleet consisting of five frigates, two brigs and their tenders.—They were standing to the Northward
