Bigger Load Needs Stronger Team

New things always have the appeal of novelty, and of ten of drama. That certainly is true of current experiments in harnessing the atom for peacetime purposes.

No one should minimize the possibilities that are inherent in this. At the same time, it seems pretty certain that millions of us have been over-sold on atomic energy, to the extent where we are coming to believe that before long it will make the conventional fuels obsolete.

You'd search a long time before finding a qualified scientist or engineer to support that view. First of all, difficult technical and economic problems remain to be solved before there can be industrial use of the atom on any significant scale. And, even if those problems are solved sooner than is generally anticipated, our potential demand for energy will make it necessary to team up ever-increasing quantities of the old fuels with the new.

Coal is a case in point. In about 20 years, it is forecast, our need for coal will at least double. If a defense emergency comes, and other fuels are diverted to military purposes, the demand will be far greater still. And, luckily, we have enough proven coal reserves to last 2,400 years at the 1954 production rate.

Energy is the key to progress in our era—the bigger the load the stronger the energy team that will be needed to pull it.

The Minimum Wage And Employment

Paul L. Poirot has contributed an article to The Freeman magazine which carries the title, "Inhumanity of the Minimum Wage."

That is a startling title indeed—but Mr. Poirot does an excellent job of proving the thesis that a compulsory minimum wage injures the very people it is proposed to help. Here is a key argument "Work, as such, is not something scarce and useful to human beings. Sheer effort is not one of the things men will buy in the market place. The goods and services produced by workmen are the things valued, regardless of how much or how little labor went into their creation."

Among other ill effects, when wages are artificially boosted with no compensatory increase in production fewer jobs will be available. So, to quote Mr. Poriot again, "The higher the minimum wage level, the more unemployment there must be."

Who Wants Socialism?

It has been asked: "How much would you contribute for a socialistic U.S.A.?"

It's an odds-on bet that the vast majority of Americans wouldn't contribute a plugged nickel—that, to the contrary, they'd give handsomely to prevent socialism with its inevitable destruction of politcal and economic freedom from getting a grip here.

Yet, unwittingly, the American people have not only permitted socialism to root and grow in this country, but millions of them have actively encouraged it.

Excellent examples are the great tax-subsidized, tax free government electric power systems. No matter what polite name we may call them by, this is socialism And the end result, if the policy is continued, will be government monopoly of a service that is vital to industry, agriculture and domestic living. That means sweepng government control over our lives and activities. The bureaucrat becomes the boss—and, ultimately, the dictator.

It cannot be truthfully argued that government must build these systems because private enterprise is unable or unwilling to do so. Private enterpise has proven beyond the shadow of a doubt, that it can accomplish any necessary job, no matter how big or costly. And it will do it with private savings—not our tax money. It will pay heavy taxes, too, for the privilege of carrying on the business.

Yes, you're paying for socialism—not only in dollars, but in the infinitely more important coin of diminished liberty, diminished opportunity, and diminished independence.
