ABOUT FERTILIZERS. A SUBJECT OF VITAL IMPORTANCE TO FRUIT GROWERS AND FARMERS GENERALLY.

Messa. BROOKS KENT NEWS.—A large part of the best farming lands in Kent County is now occupied in the cultivation of peaches, and all over this peninsula this peach interest is at present growing importance. Notwithstanding the intelligent attention given to the subject—the large expenditures of money, and time—the peach crop this year was not what the growers hoped for. The failure with some varieties was entire and others failed to give a desirable crop.

The most thrifty-looking orchards often fail in producing profitable for any length of time we have abundant evidence. The cultivation of the fruit, the June drop, yellow, &c., often proving disastrous to the grower. To overcome these difficulties should be the object of science if it is possible to treat the subject from that standpoint. So many are ignorant of the facts, that I feel the publishing book in the way of any attempt to explain the difficulty, although there must be a cause for the trouble alluded to and there must be a remedy. It will be known that the soil is a large crop of peach crop will prove an entire success, and that the soil is a large crop of peach crop will prove an entire success, and that the soil is a large crop of peach crop will prove an entire success.

The facts about this matter are as follows: The soil is a large crop of peach crop will prove an entire success, and that the soil is a large crop of peach crop will prove an entire success.

MARRIED ON HORSEBACK. Tennessee Lovers Escape and Are Married. From the Nashville American.

A novel and thrilling runaway marriage occurred a few days ago in Williamson county, the facts about which have just come to the surface. A young man, well-to-do farmer, about ten miles east of Franklin, and a beautiful girl, the only daughter of an old and rich stock-raiser by the name of Tom, had eloped.

They had been knowing each other for years, and had been engaged for some time. The old man opposed the marriage, not because of any special objection to his daughter's suitor, but because he wished to see her married to a man who would be a credit to the family. He would have been glad to give her a dowry of a fine horse and harness, but she would not have it.

Several attempts to run away had been frustrated by the stern parent, who told the young man if he tried again to elope he would have to leave the country. He was, however, not so easily deterred. He had a plan, and he was determined to carry it out. One day he went to a by-way near his father's place where she was waiting for him, and taking her by the hand he rode off on his horse.
