IT WAS A BIG WEDDING. And Took Place in Tread's House in the "Good Old Days."

The news of the death in New Orleans the other day of Mrs. Mary Amelia Maguin, wife of Arthur Andrew Maguin, and daughter of the late William M. Tread, recalled to many New Yorkers that lady's magnificent wedding, which was a side-by-side wonder before the crash of the great game.

The wedding took place in the fall of 1868, and the "old times," which have been heard talking about it—two years before the crash—at Tread's then unpretentious residence on Thirty-third street, between Fifth and Sixth avenues. It was held in the afternoon.

At that time the public Tread was merely deputy commissioner of public works, but in political circles he was "the boss." Consequently, city business for the afternoon was almost entirely suspended, while all interested flocked to the residence.

It was a "great crash," a room full of flowers, a charming bride and a room full of guests. The bride looked charming, being something that had never been equalled in the city. Those who succeeded in getting in had a fine time, and the wedding was a success.
