Mr. Appleton's Boarders.

Hiram Appleton was fond of money and as he lived in the most economical manner and managed to accumulate a considerable sum of it. As an instance of his economy he had worn the same blue coat with brass buttons for 10 years, to church and to muster, and there was considerable probability of his having to serve as much longer. Hiram was a bachelor. He considered a wife an expensive luxury from which he abstained from economical motives.

In the course of time, however, Hiram came to take a different view of the matter. He read somewhere that it was saving to be married, as the work that a wife would do would more than pay the expenses of her board. Hiram considered that under his circumstances this was a consideration of some importance.

"Besides," thought he, "we might take boarders, and taking boarders is profitable if you don't keep 'em too well. I've heard that Aunt Jane Doolittle made a thousand dollars clear in a year from keeping boarders. And all the labor comes of the wimmin folks, too. I guess I must be married."

Mr. Appleton decided on the whole to marry a widow. Just at this time there came into town a certain widow Jones, on a visit to a relation. As Mr. Appleton was well acquainted at the house where she was visiting, he soon found it in his way to call around.

"You'd better," said Mrs. Felton, "for there's no knowing how soon you'll get up." Instead of regarding Hiram's injunction as a rebuff, he regarded it as a challenge.

"You're wrong," said the widow, shaking her head. "I had it just twelve years ago next spring. I don't think it necessary to mention that though it had been bought at that time, it had been cast aside some ten years since, and had been resuscitated for the sake of producing an impression on Mr. Appleton."

"This is so unexpected," murmured the widow, "and yet I feel that a man of your just sentiments and prudent habits is not to be slighted. I will accept your offer in the same spirit in which it was made."

Mr. Appleton was delighted. He had just what he wanted. He had a sensible woman, Mrs. Jones, and she was a better match for him than he had expected. He had just what he wanted. He had a sensible woman, Mrs. Jones, and she was a better match for him than he had expected.

The minister's and were united without any display. Hiram wore the same blue coat with brass buttons which he had worn so long and faithfully.

"How much shall I give you?" asked Hiram of the clergyman who had united them. "Whatever you please," said the clergyman, politely.

"How much?" returned his wife. "Sixty-three dollars," returned Hiram. "I'll give you a three. The extra quarter will do for miscellaneous expenses."

"That will depend a little on circumstances. I think I can be back by the end of the week." "And you feel pretty sure of bringing back some boarders?" asked Hiram.

"I think I can promise you six at least," said his wife confidently. "Six?" returned Hiram with satisfaction. "Six, at three dollars a week, will make eighteen dollars. The actual cost of keeping them more than makes up the dollar apiece. That will make twelve dollars clear weekly, or six hundred dollars a year."

"You're right," said Mrs. Felton, "for there's no knowing how soon you'll get up." Instead of regarding Hiram's injunction as a rebuff, he regarded it as a challenge.
