A VERY VALUABLE
LITTLE FARM
AT Public Sale.

THE subscriber will sell at Public Sale, at the Dill House, Frederick city, at 2 o'clock, p. m., on Saturday, the 2nd of February, 1867, that beautiful and very valuable
LITTLE FARM,
situated 4 miles North of Frederick city, on the Emmittsburg Turnpike Road, formerly the property of Dr. Hull, and near the second Toll gate, Containing about 16 Acres, more or less of Land, and suitable for a Market Farm, the principal portion of it is in an APPLE AND PEACH ORCHARD.
The Trees, both Apple and Peach, are young and thrifty, and in full bearing, of the very choicest collection that could be had, as there was no expense or pains spared in procuring the Trees, and the Fruit cannot be excelled by any in the county. The improvements are a very comfortable
Dwelling House,
with 10 rooms, several convenient outhouses, together with Stable, Carriage House, Meat House, with Ice House and Milk House attached, a very large Garden, with all kinds of small Fruit, such as currants, cherries, apricots, plums, pears, gages, &c., also, pure water near the door, all under good fencing.
This sale will offer great inducements as it seldom that such property comes in market, and is very valuable.
TERMS OF SALE.—One-half cash on the day of sale or on the first day of April, 1867, (at the option of the purchaser,) the other half in two equal payments at six and twelve months, the deferred payments to be secured to the satisfaction of the subscriber, bearing interest from the first day of April, 1867, until paid. The property is free of incumbrance, and when the whole of the purchase money is paid, and not before, a good and sufficient deed will be given for the same.

I AM THINE.

The tide will ebb at day's decline
Ich bin dein!
Impatient for the open sea
At anchor rocked the tossing ship,
That ship that only waits for thee;
Yet with no tremor of the lip
I say again, thy hand is mine.
Ich bin dein!

I shall not weep, or grieve or pine,
Ich bin dein!
Go here once more thy restless bands
Afar within the azure sea—
Traverse Arabia's scorching sands—
Fly where no thought can follow thee,
O'er desert waste and billowy brine,
Ich bin dein!

Dream on the slopes of Appenine,
Ich bin dein!
Stand where the glaciers freeze and frown,
Where Alpine torrents flash and foam,
Or watch the loving sun go down
Behind the purple hills of Rome,
Leaving a twilight half divine,
Ich bin dein!

Thy steps may fall beside the Rhine,
Ich bin dein!
Slumber may kiss thy drooping lids
Amid the misses of the Nile;
The shadow of the pyramids
May cool thy feet; yet all the while
Though storms may beat, or stars may shine
Ich bin dein!

Where smile the hills of Palestine
Ich bin dein!
Where rise the mosques and minarets,
Where every breath brings flowery balms
Where souls forget their dark regrets
Beneath the strange mysterious palms,
Where the banana holds the shrine,
Ich bin dein!

Too many clusters break the vine,
Ich bin dein!
The tree whose strength and life outpour
In one exultant blossom gush,
Must flowerless be forever more,
We walk this way but once friend—hush!
Our feet have left no trodden line,
Ich bin dein!

Who heaps his goblet hates his wine,
Ich bin dein!
The boat is moving from the land,
I have no chidings and no tears,
Now give me back my empty hand
To battle with the cruel years,
Behold the triumph shall be mine,
Ich bin dein!

An Interesting Story.

The Heir of Linne.

BY HEZEKIAH BUTTERWORTH.

The leading incidents of the following story are gathered from an old ballad, which, in the days of "merrie England," was almost as famous as "A Little Geste of Robin Hood." The ballad was known as the "Heir of Linne." It reminds one of the old Eastern legend:

"The golden prime
Of good Haroun Alraschid."

A thrifty old man was the Laird of Linne. He may not have been a member of Parliment, but merely one of those rich old nobles who have received their title from their estate. A grand estate he had; and, although he was a lover of "good cheer," like the other lairds of the "North Countree," he was on the whole, prudent and sparing. Prosperity smiled on his acres, and gold filled his coffers. He had an only son—the Heir of Linne—an unthrifty youth, a lover of dice and wine, rioting and loose company. The old laird was sorely grieved at this; he expected to die soon, and he foresaw that his possessions would be speedily squandered after he was gone.

When the Laird of Linne saw his end approaching, he called for his son, and bequeathed to him his gold and lands. But there was a lodge in a lonely glen that he enjoined him never to sell. "Make a vow," said he, "that you will respect this my dying request."—And the Heir of Linne made the vow. The laird then added! "When your gold is wasted, when your lands are gone, when your friends disown you, go there, and you will find a trusty friend."

The free and easy Heir of Linne now possessed wealth untold, and an evil use of it made:

"To spend the day with merry cheer,
To drink and revel every night;
To card and dice from eve till morn,
It was, I ween, his heart's delight."

But his coffers at last became bare.

There dwelt on the estate a wealthy steward, John o' the Scales. The Heir of Linne, having spent his gold, went to him for advice and assistance. John o' the Scales was a cunning man, and knew how to turn the mishaps of others to his own advantage. He received him, therefore, in the blandest manner, advised him to let nothing disturb his youthful enjoyments, and proffered him ready money in exchange for his estate. So the Heir of Linne parted with his estate, and that, too, at less than half its value:

Thus hath he sold his land so broad,
Both hill and holt, and moor and fen;
All but a poor and lonesome lodge,
That stood far in a lonely glen.

The Heir of Linne gathered again his gay comrades, and frolicked and diced, dined and wined till all of his gold was gone.

They routed, drank, and merry made
Till all his gold it waxed thin;
And then his friends they slunk away
And left the unthrifty Heir of Linne.

He had never a penny left in his purse,
Never a penny left but three;
And one was brass, another was lead,
And the third was of white monie.

Having spent his inheritance, he determined to borrow money of his friends. But alas!

One I wis was not at home.
Another had paid his gold away;
Another called him a thriftless loon,
And sharply bade him weend his way.

Now well a day, said the Heir of Linne,
Now well-a day, and woe is me;
For when I had my lands so broad,
On me they lived right merrilie.

The Heir of Linne mused on his ruined fortune—he was without money, friends or a home. Those who had shared his cheer in his jovial hours, cared nothing for him now. He regretted his day of folly, and felt alone, in an unfriendly world. He bethought himself of the lodge in the lonely glen, and the trusty friend of which his dying father had spoken. Thither he would go. The sun was falling, the shadows were gathering about the Tweed, and the distant mountains were ablaze. He moodily turned his steps towards the solitary place; he entered the lodge and found—a rope with a noose hanging from the ceiling overhead. As the ballad runs:

Away then hied the Heir of Linne,
O'er hill, and holt, and moor, and fen;
Until he came to that lonesome lodge
That stood so low in a lonely glen.

He looked up, he looked down,
To hope some comfort for to win;
But bare and loathly were the walls—
"Here's sorry cheer, quo' the Heir of Linne.

The little window, dim and dark,
Was hung with ivy, briar and yew;
No shimmering sun here ever shone,
No balesome breeze here ever blew.

No chair, no table, not he spy,
No cheerful hearth, no welcome bed,
He saw but a rope with a running noose,
Which daugling hung above his head.

There was a faded inscription in the room, telling him, since he had wasted his inheritance, to make use of the cord, and thus end his troubles:

Sorely shent with this sharp rebuke,
Sorely shent was the Heir of Linne;
His heart, I wis, was nigh to burst,
With guilt and sorrow, shame and sin.

Never a word spake the Heir of Linne,
Never a word he spake but three,
This is a trusty friend indeed,
And is right welcome unto me.

Even the dead seemed to mock him. He put the noose around his neck and sprung into the air; but, instead of the fate he expected, the ceiling gave way and he fell to the floor.

On recovering himself, he found a key attached to the end of the cord, and on it was an inscription that told him where he would find large treasure, with which to recover his estate. Sunshine in a moment dispelled his woes, and his heart danced for joy.—He made a solemn vow to be prudent and frugal in the future; "else," he added, "may the cord end all." With sprightly steps he started off to secure the treasure. He found two large chests full of gold and one of silver. The world would go well with him now, but he resolved not to speak at once of the altered situation, lest John o' the Scales should profit thereby.

It was a merry time in the old castle of Linne. John o' the Scales and his pompous wife were giving a banquet to the neighboring lairds The dishes were savory: the wine sparkled; the silver shone. Through the shadow walks of his old estate the Heir of Linne approached the venerable pile. The evening dews were falling. The moon silvered the trees. He heard the sounds of music, and the laughter of the guests over their cheer. Old days returned upon him. His heart swelled with honest pride as he thought that he would one day bring back the goodly times of his thrifty ancestors. He entered the banquet hall. He approached the host and begged the loan of some money.

There John himself sat at the board head,
Because now Lord of Linne was he;
'I pray thee,' he said, 'good John o' the Scales
One forty pence for to lend me:'

"'Away, away, thou thriftless loon,
Away away, this may not be;
For Christ's curse on my head, he said,
If ever I trust thee one penny.

The rebuff was not unexpected to the Heir of Linne. He next went to Joan o' the Scales, and asked alms in the name of "Sweet Saint Charity." "Begone!" cried the imperious woman, proud of her power to insult the Heir of Linne; "thou'lt get no alms from me." She then called him a spend thrift and a fool, and spoke of him in connection with the gallows. But a kind hearted guest, regretting to see the Heir of Linne so badly treated, offered him the money, and ventured to say a word in his favor.

"Then up bespoke a good fellow,
Who sat at John o the Scales board,
Said, turn again, thou Heir of Linne,
Some time thou wast a well good lord.

"Some time a good fellow thou hast been,
And spredest not thy gold and fee,
Therefore I'll lend thee forty pence,
And other forty if need he,

"And over, I pray thee, John o' the Scales,
To let him sit in thy companie,
For well I wot thou hadst his land,
And a good bargain it was to thee.

This kindled the ire of John o' the Scales. "A good bargain!" he exclaimed, contemptously. "Curses on my head if I was not the looser by the purchase." He then made an unwitting offer:

"And here I proffer thee, Heir of Linne,
Before these lords so fair and free,
That thou shalt have it cheaper back.
By a hundred marks than I had it off thee.

"I take you at your word," said the Heir of Linne. "Here is the earnest money, and here is the gold:"

"And he pull'd forth three bags of gold,
And laid them down upon the board,
All woe begone sat John o' the Scales,
So shent he could say never a word.

"He told him forth the good red gold,
He told it forth wi' mickle din:
The gold is thine, the land is mine,
And now I'm again the Lord of Linne."

The astonished wife of John o' the Scales resigned her brief importance with the affecting lamentation:

"Now well a day, said Joan o' the Scales,
Now well a day and woe's my life;
Yestreen I was my Lady of Linne,
Now I'm but John o' the Scales' wife."

The Heir of Linne made the clever guest who offered to lend him the money, keeper of his forests "of the wild deer and tame;" and to John o' the Scales he said, "Farewell forever! Curses upon me if I ever imperil my inheritance again."

The story is worth remembering for its wholesome moral lessons. "If you would know the truth of money," says Franklin, "try to borrow some." We know not our friends in prosperity, and many a haughty woman has had occasion to say,

"Yestreen I was my Lady of Linne,
Now I'm but John o' the Scales' wife.

CURIOUS FACTS ABOUT WATER.—The extent to which water mingles with bodies, apparently the most solid, is very wonderful. The glittering opal which beauty wears as an ornament, is only flint and water. Of every 1,200 tons of earth which a landlord has in his estate, 400 are water. The snow-capped summits of Snowden and Ben Nevis have many million tons of water in a solidified form. In every plaster of Paris statue which an Italian carries through our streets for sale, there is one pound of water to four pounds of chalk. The air we breath contains five grains of water to each cubic foot of its bulk. The potatoes and turnips which are boiled for our dinner have, in their raw state, the one seventy-five per cent. and the other ninety percent. of water. If a man weighing ten stone were squeezed in a hydraulic press, seven and a half stone of water would run out, and only two and a half of dry residue remain. A man is, chemically speaking, forty five pounds of carbon and nitrogen, diffused through five and a half pailsful of water. In plants we find water thus mingling no less wonderfully. A sunflower evaporates one and a quarter pints of water a day, and a cabbage about the same quantity. A wheat plant exhales, in 172 days, about 100,000 grains of water. An acre of growing wheat, on this calculation, draws and passes out about ten tons of water per day. The sap of plants is the medium through which this mass of fluid is conveyed. It forms a delicate pump, up which the watery particles run with the rapidity of a swift stream. By the action of the sap various properties may be communicated to the growing plant. Timber in France is for instance, dyed by various colors being mixed with water and sprinkled over the root of the tree. Dahlias are also colored by a similar process.

EDITORIAL GRENADES.—John Quincey Adams, son of the present U. S. Minister to the Court of St. James, in a speech at Taunton, near Boston, says:—"The demands of Congress amounts to a rebuilding of our government upon an essentially new plan The central idea of the old was a voluntary compact, the plan of the new's compulsory co-habitation." And he might have almost added, "with negroes" This gentleman also declared in the same speech that the southern people ought neither to "pass the amendment," nor to "betray their old leaders and hold them over to constitutional disqualification," and he bravely added, "I shall despise them if they do." Well and nobly said. There is not an honest man in all the world who does not say the same. Those sneaks called "Southern Loyalists," are a set of despised creatures, who would not be admitted to the society of gentlemen in any part of the world—not to the highest toned gentlemen, even in Massachusetts.

THE FRENCHMAN AND YANKEE.—A Yankee and a Frenchman owned a pig in co-partnership. When killing time came, they wished to devide the carcass. Yankee was anxious to divide so that he could get both hind quarters and persuade the Frenchman that the proper way to was to cut it across the back. The Frenchman agreed to it, on condition that the Yankee would turn his back and take choice of the pieces after it was cut in two. The Yankee turned his back and Frenchman asked:

"Vich piece vil you have; ze peace vid tail on him, or ze peice vat aint got no tail on him."

"The piece with the tail!" shouted Yankee saantly.

"Den you take him and I take ze oder," said the Frenchman.

Upon turning around the Yankee found that the Frenchman had cut off the tail and struck it in the pig's mouth.

SKATES.—Skates have been brought to great perfection, and they range at various prices, from two dollars to one hundred and twenty five dollars. We have examined ten dollar skates, twenty dollar skates, fifty dollar skates, all of the same model and of equal lustre.—Some are made entirely of steel, others are silver mounted, and we have seen some with gold mountings handsomely and appropriately engraved. Of course, gold being at a premium, this latter kind brings the highest rates. Skates are something like sewing machines—much depends upon the style in which they are finished.—Philadelphia Press.

A TRUTHFUL ANSWER.—Bunkhum, in the old North State, is undoubtedly the healthiest spot on earth and it was on that account that some "lower country gentlemen" were surprised one day to see a Bunkhumite at work on an ominous hole in the ground. Of course they inquired what he was about.

"Digging a grave, sir."

"Digging a grave! Why I thought people didn't die often here—do they?"

"Oh, no sir, they never die but once!"

They never asked that question "but once."

In consideration of the utter destitution of citizens of South Carolina in the portions of that State which were desolated by the late war, it is proposed by numerous citizens of Fauquier, County Va., to hold a public meeting at the Court house, in the town of Warrenton, to make provision for their speedy relief by the contribution of corn, which is absolutely needed to save them from starvation, in consequence of their additional misfortune in the utter failure of their crops.

A negro was arrested in Lynchburg for striking another, and taken before the Mayor. He plead in extenuation, says the News, that the negro struck belonged to the "old issue," (meaning that he was free before the war,) and therefore, wanted to impose on him The "old issue" hold themselves above the new, and compose the upper-crust of colored society.

"Do you think you can do the landlord in the Lady of Lyons?" said a manager to a seedy actor in quest of an engagement.

"I've done a good many landlord."

Black Suffragans for a Song.

While the question of negro suffrage in the District of Columbia was being discussed by Congress, the freedmen were induced to crowd the galleries of the Senate and House of Representatives, and to grin, chatter, and applaud when complimentary sugar plums were showered upon them by the political albinoes of Congress Much was said about the intelligence, wealth, industry and exceedingly comfortable condition of the negroes of the District, and much stress was laid upon their capacity to take care of themselves. These arguments had their weight with men who were prepared to be easily convinced, and in spite of the veto of the President, the bill giving unrestricted suffrage to the negroes in the District became a law.

The necessity for concealing the true condition of these black suffragans having ceased, the New York Tribune, the paper of all others most vociferous in proclaiming the industry and wealth of the negroes of the District, now depicts their poverty, misery and starving condition in the most eloquent and moving terms. The "bread" for which they asked has turned out an exceedingly indigestible stone, and, as negroes are not ostriches, they cannot eat it.—Hence, the suffragans, are starving, and the charitable are appealed to to help the poor wretches. These black ESAUS have, it seems, returned from their long hunt after the right of suffrage very hungry, and would, no doubt, barter their birth-right for a soup ticket.

The Tribune admits that there are "many thousands Blacks, in and around Washington, who fled from Slavery and Treason (we give the capitals and all) to the protecting folds of the Stars and Stripes."

This sounds very grand, but in the very next sentence, and in the same paragraph, GREELEY tells us that "idleness privation, suffering, and, in some cases thriftlessness, demoralization and crime have overtaken these proleges of the Stars and Stripes."

He is not prodigal of his capitals, by the way, in enumerating the vices of these negroes; but he tells the truth, at least, about their condition, and for that we are thankful. In speaking of the condition of these people, HORACE so far forgets himself as to assert that the "District market is greatly overstocked"—with black voters, (a glut of starving suffragans,) for whose behalf GREELEY holds out his deplorably battered old white hat and begs for "a few dollars."

He implores everybody to hasten to Washington and deport these newly made voters who are wallowing in vice and steeped to their thick lips in the most desperate poverty. "Let," yells the frantic philanthropist, "the better citizens of every neighborhood (even "Traitors" are begged to come in and help themselves) where labor is wanted, club together and subscribe a few dollars each and send to Washington for labor, especially for household labor;, And to enable one of the ever-vigilant, greedy old strong-minded New England tabbies to turn an honest penny by this sale of suffragans, HORACE adds: "Let him [the agent for the deporters of suffragans] call, at once on Mrs. Josephine S. Griffin, [Phœbus, what a name!] agent of the National Relief Association for Distressed Freedmen, [suffragans,] and ask her aid in selecting from the thousands under her eye such as shall be deemed best adapted to the wants of those he represents." Here then is a general scramble for the newly-invented suffragans, implored by their greatest champion. Whoever wants a "voter" cheap, let that man at once give the strong minded "GRIFFIN" a dollar, and he can get him at once. We direct the attention of our readers to the propriety of investing in these cheap suffragans. We are threatened with disfranchisement, and if things come to the worse, it will be very advantageous to have a black boy at our command to
