It is well to be on the safe side and insist on the tuberculin test.

LIABLE TO BECOME CHOKED

Trouble Is Likely to Occur When Animals Attempt to Devour Vegetables Without Mastication.

(By H. S. EAKINS, Colorado Station.) Of all animals on the farm, cattle are, perhaps, the most liable to become choked. Choking is most liable to result from attempting to swallow without mastication, carrots, turnips, potatoes, apples or sugar beets. Cattle frequently choke from chewing All persons are warned against trespass- leather, boot heels, old rags and all dersigned with dog, gun or otherwise after this sorts of unseemly things which could not be digested if swallowed, and the practice indicates a depraved appetite. In such cases, if the services of a veterinarian cannot be secured the owner will have to do the best he can alone, and the things that are usually done first should not be done at all. Attempting to pour water down the throat usually results in most of it going into the lungs, and the result is death of the animal, that might otherwise have been saved. A case of turnip choke came under observation recently. A sharp-pointed broomstick was thrust down into the throat in an effort to push the turnip downward, and the animal died from the injury. Less heroic efforts will usually relieve the animal. Whatever is attempted to relieve the sufferingg animal, do not try the drench or the
