A WISE OLD SQUIRE.

A rare old book which would delight the heart of every boy who has him the making of a manly man is the "Life of Thomas Assheton Smith," who for a half century was the first hunter in England, and of whom Napoleon is reported to have said, "That grand chasseur can control horses as I do men.

This modern Nimrod was the owner of great estates. The best horses and dogs in England were in his vast stables and kennels, and he boasted that every one of them was his friend.

It is said that when a new purchase of hounds arrived he would go among them, giving to each a mouthful of food, while he stroked its head and looked steadily and kindly into its

"Now I know them and they know me," he would say, and ever after the dogs would come bounding to meet him. In the morning the packs would rush from the kennels to the park gates and wait, panting with eagerness for him to come out.

"No horse," he used to say, "ever told me a lie. A horse is a born gentleman." Another of his maxims was, "The man who is a friend of horses should be clean, honorable and fit to be a companion of ladies." He sternly discountenanced drink, gambling, and all vices common among men of his class and time. No horse which he owned was ever allowed to work on Sunday.
