and Barn, in ordinary repair. The Fencing is fair.

There is also a Landing on Still Pond Creek within one mile of the farms.

PARIS NOTES.

MESSRS. EDITORS:—Easter or (Le Paques) was a great festival in Paris, of much more importance than Xmas. From the beginning of Lent until Ascension Day the grocery stores and cremeries display baskets of colored eggs for sale, while during Easter week all manner of designs of eggs, nests and fish were the raging fashion. Chocolate eggs, two feet in length, containing bon-bons or toys, were in the confectionery stores and fish of all designs were eagerly sought after; candy fish, tin or chocolate fish, pictures of the same in oil or water colors were exchanged as presents during Easter. The music in the different churches was delightful.

The Cathredral of Notre Dame is the largest church in France. It was founded in 1163, on the site of an old church. It will contain, at one time, 20,000 persons. By comparison, the Cathredral of St. Paul, in London, seems very small. As I walked through Notre Dame in the centre was a congregation of five hundred people worshipping. I passed them and went on to the north end, where there were funeral services being performed for the dead, while standing near the bier and looking back I could not see the other people worshipping. This will give some idea of the enormous size of the church. I counted twenty-five altars, but could not see them all for the intervening columns. This church contains the blood-stained garments of Archbishop Darboy, who was murdered by the Communists in 1871.

The statue of Charlemagne, with two Crusaders, stands just outside the church. In the Louvre I have enjoyed very much examining the sword of the great Charlemagne, with its jeweled hilt; also, his suit of mail, most wonderfully carved in repousse work and just as perfect as if made yesterday, instead of centuries ago. Metals defy the ravages of time. The French people pay the greatest respect to the dead.

All the houses in Paris are entered by little courtyards. There are no steps directly on the streets, as in America. When a person dies the court-yard of the house is draped in black and the coffin, covered with flowers, remains some hours in this court so that all friends can pay their respects. The door leading to the street is hung with heavy curtains, held back by undertakers. Every one passing knows that some one is dead; and I must tell you all of a beautiful custom. Every one as he passes this door where the dead is lying stops and lifts his hat and then walks bareheaded past the house. No matter how much hurried he may be; no matter if it is a child or a man, rich or poor, he stops and pays this tribute to death; and when a funeral is passing through the streets you will notice the men who pass along on their business pursuits will stop a moment and with lifted hat await until the procession passes by. This act of homage to the last remains of poor humanity is so touching that it sends a thrill through the heart and rebukes us Americans, who rush and tear along, intent upon making the almighty dollar, without taking time to give a passing glance to the stranger dead, and utterly regardless of the fact that we all will soon follow.

The cemetery of Pere La Chaise is the largest in Paris. It contains over 18,000 tombs, many of them most superb in design and sculpture. The most frequented and interesting is that of Abelard and Heloise. It is built of stone, surmounted by a stone arch; the figures (statues of the lovers) repose side by side. There is an iron railing to protect it from being chipped for relics by tourists, who are always hanging around with guide books. On this railing the French girls hang wreaths of flowers, invoking the assistance of Abelard and Heloise in their love dreams. The gothic canopy over the tombs is composed of fragments of stone from the convent of Paraclet, where Abelard was Abbot. I picked some pansies from the tomb of the great actress Rachel, who lies in the Jewish quarter.

Near this cemetery is now being celebrated a great festival, called La Fehe du Pain d'Epice, or the Gingerbread Fair. It lasts a month, and here is to be seen Parisian life in all of its phases. Gayety is no name for the fun. Everybody sells gingerbread, except those who buy it, and it is displayed in all kinds of shapes principally animals—like cows, dogs and pigs, mammoth boys and girl dolls of cake, some plain, others decorated with flowers and names in sugar icing. The pig is the favorite design; it has various names on the side, such as Claude, Marie, Pauline, Felix, Jean. The beaux buy a pig (cake) for the belles, and vice versa. Then they tie it on the neck with a string and promenade around, smiling and happy, or dance with the peasants in blue blouses, while a hundreds bands are bellowing music, and merry go-rounds are flying, and people are wound by a crank in balloons and flying horses are on the go, and children are buying shrimps from peddlers and eating them in paper bags like peanuts, and all the restaurants are brilliantly lighted and everybody who is not eating gingerbread is drinking sour wine around small tables outside of the restaurants, and everybody altogether is happy and smiling, with never a care for to-morrow, and here is French life in all its perfection, and the motto is, "Smile while you may."

The weather now is about like Maryland. Fruit trees are in blossom and the river banks and woods lined with people sketching, for it is said there are over ten thousand artists in and around Paris. The great Louvre picture gallery is open to the world free of charge, and constantly filled with crowds of sight-seeing people. The spring exhibitions of pictures will open next week and all the ocean steamers come crowded with Americans to visit these exhibitions. ROSALIE MITCHELL.

PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS.

MESSRS. EDITORS KENT NEWS:—How the spirit of improvement is promoted is not generally understood. A thing of beauty has lost much of its value when it fails to be appreciated. Those who build fine houses have a two-fold purpose in view. The interior is so arranged and furnished as to give the greatest amount of comfort to those who are to occupy it. The exterior is so ornamented and beautified as to attract the attention and to sometimes provoke the envy of those whose privilege is to occupy the outside; and to withhold our approbation or conceal our appreciation is to discourage the spirit of improvement.

As a casual visitor to your county, having frequent opportunity to note the character of the improvements in different sections of the country, I am free to say that within a short time Kent county has erected some of the most complete and tasty town cottages and country villas to be found anywhere on the peninsula. Notably, many in Chestertown should be seen to be appreciated. The fine country residence of Mr. N. Barnard, at Barnard's wharf, as a country residence is especially worthy of note. The exterior design is very pleasing, while the exterior finish is of natural wood, hard finish; heated throughout by indirect radiated steam heat, and in all interior appointments is quite a model affair. It occupies a commanding position, with a water view overlooking the entrance of the Susquehanna, Sassafras and Elk rivers to the Chesapeake Bay, a position worthy of the structure. Verily the spirit of improvement is abroad in Kent county, and to fail in giving expression to our appreciation is to withhold the helping hand. VISITOR.

How to Guess the Speed of Trains.

There is not one person in one hundred of the millions who travel on railroads in the course of a year who has any idea of the speed of a train. A large per cent. of even the regular trainmen of the country cannot tell, with any degree of accuracy, how fast a train is running. Frequently engineers are dispatched on a trip over a line of railroad with instructions to run at a speed of a certain number of miles an hour. The engineers do not carry a speed indicator, but have learned by various methods to gauge their engines so as to make only the slightest variations from their orders.

The majority of engineers use their driving wheel as a gauge. They know its circumference, and by counting its revolutions within a certain time can tell accurately the speed at which they are running. Another method is to make calculations from the number of telegraph poles passed in a certain time. These poles in a level country, and where four or five wires are used, are spaced so that they are thirty to the mile. If only a single wire is used, they are spaced from twenty-five to twenty-eight to the mile.

The most accurate method, and the one most in use by experienced railroad men, is to count the number of rail joints the train passes over in twenty seconds. The rails in nearly all cases are thirty feet in length, and the number passed over in twenty seconds is the speed per hour the train is running. For instance, if a passenger sitting in a sleeper can count thirty clicks of the wheels on a rail joint in twenty seconds, the train is running at the speed of thirty miles an hour.

A Philosophical View.

Young people, when in the halcyon days of their courtship, are prone to invest each other with the attributes of angels, and the closer intimacy of married life reveals the fact that they are simply human, after all, having faults and failings that fall in a measure even to the best of us. While this discovery may cause surprise and discontent, it need not result in unhappiness, particularly if one is of the philosophical turn of mind of the old lady mentioned in the following incident:

"When my Josiah and me was first married," she said, "I'd an idea that he hadn't a fault in the world. I wouldn't hear to anything but that he was perfect; and he thought the same of me.

"He just thought, Josiah did, that he'd drawn one of them impossible prizes in the lottery of matrimony—a woman without a fault.

"Well, by the time we'd gone through two or three housekeeping scrapes, a taking up and putting down carpets and setting up and tearing down stoves and all that sort of thing, to say nothing of 'blue Monday,' wash day and toothaches that lasted three days at a time—time we'd gone through all that, Josiah had found out that I wa'nt quite an angel, and I'd discovered that he could do and say things the saints would skeersely do and say.

"And one day, in one of my penitent spells, I says to Josiah, says I: 'I ain't the person you thought I was, am I, Josiah? I ain't half as good and sweet as you thought I'd be.'

"We was at the dinner table when I said it, and there was a dish of beautiful honey on the table. Josiah picked it up, and he says, says he: 'Mirandy, I like honey as well as any man living likes it, and you like it, too, but if we had to eat it three times a day for even six months we'd get so despritly sick of it we'd never want to hear the word 'honey' again. Variety,' says he, 'is the spice of life, sure enough.'

"And most married folks, I take notice, don't eat honey three times a day, and they've variety enough to make life very interestin'."

Peaches in Western Maryland.

The Hagerstown Mail publishes in its last issue an item from the NEWS relative to the prospective peach crop and adds: We find the above in the Kent News of Saturday last and it conveys proper information for our people to have as to the probable yield of the peach crop on the peninsula this season. In our peach section the prospect is most promising; in fact, from present indications there will be the greatest yield of peaches along the South Mountain this year that ever has been. The bloom was remarkable and even those trees that bore abundantly last year were covered with blossoms this, and in what is known as the "Peach Belt" we have not heard of any injury at all from frost. Down in the valley and in particularly low ground almost bordering upon the "Belt" the buds on some trees at the critical period were killed; and a friend mentions a case when riding along in the Keedysville neighborhood, he asked a farmer how his trees were getting on, and was told that they were struck by the frost, whilst pointing to the mountain side above, he added, the trees were uninjured and full of fruit. Some of the larger peach growers propose to th
