Col. Theodore Roosevelt won his suit against the Michigan Republican editor who said in print that the Colonel got drunk. The editor had to admit on the stand that he and his attorneys could not find anybody in the whole country who had ever seen anything whatever to justify the charge, and that he was therefore mistaken. A long list of public men associated for years with Colonel Roosevelt, had testified that he was most temperate. The slander did no harm to the plaintiff and he was magnanimous and did not seek to punish the writer as he might easily have done. The suit and its ending carries its useful lessons, however, and one of the men who will not forget them is the Michigan editor.

"AN OUTGROWN CONSTITUTION.

Perhaps there were a thousand people who heard the remarkable lecture of Dr. Frank Dixon, of Washington, at the Chautauqua tent on Tuesday evening T. W. WOOD & SONS, last. It was a very instructive address, well worth careful attention and reflection. The present Constitution, he said, should be strengthened, improved all along the line, and to this end an amendment should be passed which would make such amendments of much more easy accomplishment. He referred to the fact that so obvious a public need as the election of United States Senators by the people had to be fought for twenty years before the victory which DENTON TOWN REAL ESTATE! such a vast majority of the people had demanded was achieved.

No institution is sacred that does not serve an end, he said. Again, he declared, he had no respect for precedents, at public sale to the highest bidder and that everything has been made
