ENGLISH SYMPATHY FOR AMERICA.

By A. W. MACY. The sentiment in England against America during the Revolutionary war was not unanimous by any means. If a popular vote had been taken it is likely that a majority would have been found favoring the American side. On June 24 1775, the lord-mayor and aldermen of London adopted an "Address, Remonstrance and Petition" to the king, expressing their abhorrence of the tyrannical measures pursued against their fellow-subjects in America, and asking him to dismiss his ministers and counsellors who were responsible for such an unrighteous war. Being notified of this, the king signified his willingness to receive the petition at his next levee, or public reception. The lord-mayor and aldermen refused to present it except when he was sitting on his throne. He replied that he would receive any kind of a petition, but he must be the judge as to where. Both sides were stubborn, and the petition was never officially presented. They took care, however, that a copy of it was presented to the king
