Mr. Scoville has issued an address to the public in which he says: The question now arises, after the verdict, what shall be done? Three reasons: First, from loyalty to my wife, his sister; second, because I feel the defence to be just, and therefore required by humanity; third, to save the nation the lasting disgrace of hanging an insane man to gratify popular revenge, and at the same time of placing on the records of history, through a judicial proceeding, the solemn judgment that it was impossible for an American citizen of sound mind to murder the President of the United States.

It is to be noted that there is a bare possibility that Judge Cox will grant a new trial. If over-ruled, judgment and sentence will be passed upon the prisoner to be executed the latter part of June. Several weeks will be allowed in that event to make up a bill of exceptions for appeal to the general term of court. The question of public interest presented is whether such appeal shall be earnestly and ably prosecuted.
