PHILADELPHIA, Feburary 2, 1885. Carpets have taken adownward lurch. Ingrain tumbles; Tapestry tumbles to Ingrain; Brussels to Tapestry; Velvet to Tapestry; Moquette below Brussels; Smyrna almost to Tapestry.

People who were going to buy one are thinking of the next grade higher. The new prices point to different carpets or less expense. Which shall it be? They need to know about the carpets of which they are thinking now -as much as they know about those they were going to buy before.

There is reason, therefore, for putting in print the commonest facts about wellknown carpets.

Tapestry looks like Brussels, as every body knows. There are several grades of it. Few can distinguish one from another. Certain makes command the highest prices, partly because of the difficulty of judging the grades. But, as buyers generally have no means of knowing one make from another, they have to trust the seller. Buying Tapestry, then, is apt to be an act of confidence. We propose to make it less so. So is buying Brussels. We propose to make it safer. And the same of the others.

What is Tapestry carpet? What is Brussels? One is a copy of the other. Tapestry costs about two-thirds as much as Brussels; and, on the floor, there is very little difference between them.

The frame-work of both is hard inflexible cotton and jute. If you take a bit of each and pull the woolen yarn all out, there is left, of the Brussels, the frame-work that holds it together and gives it stiffness; it looks like a sieve, with meshes about ten to the inch. Of the Tapestry more is left. When the wool is drawn out of the face, the back is solid with jute. Pull out this solid back of jute, and only the frame-work is left; the same as the frame-work of Brussels. The difference between the stuffs of Brussels and Tapectry, then, is jute in the place of a part of the

The face of Brussels and Tapestry, both, is a mass of loops of colored woolen yarn held fast by the hidden framework of cotton and jute below; and the colors form the carpet's figure. The carpets goodness as to durability depends on the making, of course, but mainly on the wool in the loop's and what is under the loops. One judges Tapestry by the number of loops to the inch. The best has ten; the poorest down to six. Turn it over, and look at the back. frame-work, the more sparse the loops and the wool on What is under the face? What effect does it have? The loops on the face of Brussels are backed by wool below. The loops on the face of Tapestry are backed by jute. Wool is soft, and jute face, of course, wears longer against a back of yielding wool than against a back of unyielding jute. So Brussels wears longer than Tapestry, How much longer? By as is gentler to the trampled loops than jute; so much; no more. It isn't soft enough to have the difference felt by the foot in use. The maker's object in using wool instead of jute is only to make a softer bottom to wear against. The luxurious softness one feels with the foot comes only of carpet-lining.

This back of wool in Brussels has another consequence. It is the source of colors to make the carpet's rather the wool of the Bruscarpet consists, of several yarns of different colors lying side by side in tenth-of-an-inch or so, one out of the bundle of colored yarns is looped above; and the varn that is taken to the delivery of Grain to the elethe yarn that is taken to form the loop is the yarn of the color the pattern requires just there. The nearest approach to that standard is found in the best makes. There is "five-frame" Brussels with under threads of jute in place of wool; a sort of mongrel Brussels-and-Tapestry. But we need not go into all the adulterations. We have set forth these two staple carpet-fabrics as fairly and fully as we can in brief. You will buy the safer if you have read with care, especially after a little carpet-dissecting. What we have told is by no means all there is to tell.
