THE BOUQUET.

"MUCH YET REMAINS UNSUNG."

From the New-York Statesman.

HAPPINESS.

I sought thee in the haunts of men,
Through fashion's giddy maze;
I sought thee in the silent glen,
Through pathless, trackless ways.
'Neath splendid domes, in humble cot,
I woo'd thy smile, but found it not.

I sought thee in the festive hall,
Where friends convivial meet;
But there a secret voice exclaim'd,
Beware! there dwells deceit.
The shade thou seek'st, can ne'er be found
Where luxury spreads her bane around.

At dissipation's shrine I knelt,
And sought thy influence there;
I drain'd the wine-cup—soon I felt
I'd grappled with despair:
I dash'd to earth the pois'nous bowl,
And spurn'd its madd'ning, base control.

I sought thee in a foreign land,
O'er ocean's briny tide,
And found, 'mid pleasure's glitt'ring band,
Thy favor was denied.
'Tis not where mirth and glee resound,
That happiness is always found.

I sought thee in the hermit's cell,
The solitary's seat,
And thought on earth if thou didst dwell,
'Twould be in this retreat:
But even here thou wert unknown,
Thou dwellest not where man's alone.

Through ev'ry varied scene I pass'd,
Of pleasure, pain and strife,
In search of thee, and found at last,
Thy blessing in a WIFE!
For when affections firmly bind
The heart, there happiness we find.

EXTRACTS

From the "Winter in Washington."

BY A LADY.

The stream which glides smoothly and gently along, attracts no attention by its murmurs: leaves no vestiges of its power; but when swoln by the tempest, it rushes on like a torrent, and overflows its banks, it commands our notice, and the ruin and devastation it spreads around. Thus is it with the life of man: when happy, how noiseless and tranquil is the tenor of his days. Weeks, months, pass unheeded, and leave no trace behind. But, when misfortune comes to disturb this calm: when the passions rise, and tear and desolate the soul, every moment leaves some mark as it passes by.

* * * * * *

However paradoxical it my seem, the heart feels most alone, most solitary, in the midst of a crowd to whom we are indifferent, unknown. This is an isolation we never experience when surrounded by the works of nature; in them there is a silent voice which whispers that God is present—and what can so soothe, so compose the pertubation, of the mind, as the felt presence of Deity! When distressed or disappointed by our fellow mortals, when suffering from their caprice or their treachery, where can we find such consolation as in the love of God? In the most solitary recess, where the voice of man never comes, the soul, in communion with its God, is less alone than in the most populous haunts of society. But the solitude of the crowd conveys a sensation of loneliness, of which those only who have felt it, can form an idea.

* * * * * *

To whom, then, can a daughter go, with such well grounded confidence, with such a full assurance of sympathy, as to an indulgent mother? Here there is an identity of interest, of honor, of happiness; therefore, there can be no room for doubt, suspicion, or jealousy; which is more than can be averred of any other connexion or friendship. The dearest friend may have a separate interest, which may lessen sympathy, or excite jealousy; or even should youthful friendship be free from these alloys, yet a friend of the same age cannot have the experience, and, consequently, the same indulgence.

* * * * * *

The performance of duty diffuses a complacency, a self satisfaction, a tranquility, which can never be enjoyed in the indulgence of pleasures contrary to its dictates. The sacrifices of inclination to duty, however difficult and painful they may be at the time, carry with them their own reward; the reward of an approving conscience. The esteem of the whole world cannot make us happy, if secretly tormented by self condemnation. But, supported by our own esteem, we can serenely smile on the commendation of the world. Oh! prefer, then, the path of duty, however rugged it may appear, and time will soon render it the path of peace.

* * * * * *

Life is a masquerade, where each appears in some fantastic form, with a face masked in smiles, while anguish corrodes the heart; profusely or splendidly ornamented without, while all within is squalid poverty; the cheeks glowing with artificial bloom, the eye sparkling with borrowed brightness, while disease and care are concealed within! Trust not, love not, this world, my Theodore; 'virtue alone, is happiness below;' and, even in adversity and suffering, the virtuous man is happier than the prosperous villain. Consider life as a scene of duty, not of enjoyment. You do not go to school my son, to play, but to labour This is but the threshold of being, the infancy of existence, a state of preparation for eternity. Oh, my son, bear this in mind—a state of preparation for eternity! According to the seed you now sow, shall you reap hereafter. Poor, indeed, would this life be, even to the richest in its enjoyments, if it was not connected with the life to come! The seed which the husbandman scatters from his hand, is small in quantity, and of little value; but, if well cultivated, what a rich harvest may he not reap! Thus, the circumstances of this life, in themselves, are but of little moment; but, on the use we make of them depends the happiness or misery of the future. If the husbandman patiently braves the rigours of winter, & the ardours of the summer, in order to obtain his scanty and perishable harvest, shall we not constantly toil and faithfully discharge the duties of life, in order to inherit an immortality of happiness? Oh, my boy, not until you are weary and heavy laden as your father is, will you rejoice, as he now rejoices, to go to HIM, who will give us rest.

Melancholy effects of tattling.—We took occasion, some time ago, to animadvert upon that evil disposition, which leads, in periods of public distress, to pry into, and, right or wrong, to talk about their neighbor's affairs. Since then we find an incident stated in a Cheraw (S. C.) paper, which confirms with lamentable accuracy those reflections. It is therein said, and we believe with truth that Mr. M'Neil, of the house of Bradford & M'Neil, of Charleston, on arriving in Charleston harbor from Liverpool, and and being informed that his house had failed, was driven to the desperate act of throwing himself overboard; and was drowned. Now his house had not, and has not failed; but amid the thousand busy and mischievous rumours of the day, their names had been mentioned as among the unfortunate, and these idle rumours were too faithfully and fatally repeated by the pilot, without knowing any thing of their truth, or of the interest which the passengers he was talking to might have in it. It would be impossible by any argument to illustrate so forcibly as by this unhappy occurrence, the pernicious and wicked consequences of such incautious or malicious babble.—N. Y. Amr.

LIGHT READING.

The Elder Scaliger.—The pride of this celebrated scholar exceeds belief, and the following anecdote is a sufficient illustration: A friend informing him by letter that he intended to mention him in a forthcoming work, desired to know what he should say of him—The answer was as appears in his printed letter as follows: "Endeavor to collect your best ideas of what Massanassa, what Zenophon and what Plato were, and your portrait will bear some, but an imperfect resemblance of me.

In answer to the following query—"Supposing a lady to have lost her fourth finger, on which finger should the wedding ring be placed?" A corrospondent says, that, a Miss Honeywood was exhibited in Dublin, who was totally destitute of fingers, and indeed of hands, and arms; she was subsequently married, and the bridegroom, upon this solemn occasion, placed the wedding ring upon one of her toes.

An Irishman was once brought up before a Magistrate for marrying six wives. The magistrate asked him how he could be so hardened a villian? "Please your worship" said Paddy, I was trying to get a good one.
