PRUSSIAN RECRUITS.

A Lieutenant Says Many of Them Are Densely Ignorant on All Subjects.

The greater proportion of the recruits come to the regiment raw in every respect, bodily, morally and mentally; no considerable number of them have already been in prison. The recruit is, as a rule, neither good nor bad; the greater part of the nation is, at the age of twenty years, morally and intellectually, at the standard of a child of educated parents at ten years.

There are even some individuals who are beneath this. I have had recruits who found great difficulty in pronouncing the number thirty-four. I asked one of these to count. His scale of numbers went up to eleven; he had heard of thirteen and seventeen, but he did not know what they meant.

This was a German; the Slavs of our fatherland are still more difficult to educate, since they do not understand German. They are further accustomed to an almost incredible amount of roughness in their intercourse with their parents and associates.

I remember a recruit who could only speak Polish, of whom I as a lieutenant had to undertake the training, and who did not understand a single word that I said, and who started vacantly before him. I told another of the recruits, who could speak German and Polish, to translate what I was saying. This fellow went up to him and gave him at once a tremendous box on the ear. When I reproved him for this he met me with the startling argument: "Oh, you must let me do it, lieutenant, he understands much better now."

The box on the ear in their society answered the same purpose as "Do you hear?" does in Berlin, or as the touch on the shoulder which many men use to draw attention to their words.

What pains is required to make such men understand all that belongs to their duty in the field, to order, and to discipline, without even once knocking them down, is only one can know whose forbearance has been thus put to a practical test. From the moral point of view also many recruits are as backward as a child 10 years old. Among many of them no trace can be found of the feeling of duty, of religious conscience, of patriotism, or of honor, while there is a proportionately small percentage of them who have any idea of good or evil.

The great mass only know good from evil from the fact that the latter is punished. "I will not do this or that, because if I do I shall be put in prison or in the house of correction. Many recruits hear first of duty, honor or patriotism from their instructor after they have joined the army.

Many of them, even from parts of the country where German is spoken, know nothing of the history of their fatherland. There is some of figures of speech which we use when some one has said something which everybody knows: "Yes, old Fritz is dead." By means of this I discovered that many of my men had never heard of Frederick the Great. I asked one of them once, and he answered: "Yes, I heard that he had died yesterday." Prince Kraft zu Hohenlohe Ingelfingen.

Automatic Spelling.

An American writer expresses the hope that, before the typewriter is many years older, some inventive genius will have been able to compass the problem how to give it some sort of dictionary attachment, which will enable it to spell better than it does at present.

Our contemporary contentedly says that this is a tall tale, and that, in a word, it is not worth the quill pen, the breadth of whose stroke, like charity, covers a multitude of sins—in orthography. Speaking generally, everybody who is not a good speller should write with as broad a nib as possible.

If it is even a little fluff at the point, why, so much the better. The great thing, of course, is to write as vaguely as may be—leave as much as may be to the imagination. Our contemporary raises the important question: "How often an uncertainty in regard to these two combinations is got by the slipshod addition of a little more obscurity to the unintelligibility of one's handwriting? It is, indeed, whispered that there are people who actually cultivate a rather blurred calligraphy in order to disguise an orthographic weakness which would otherwise be only too apparent.

The typewriter, it is clear, must be avoided by such persons—unless, indeed, the suggested attachment can be made.

And then, conceive the popularity of the machine—imagine the run upon it, its almost universal adoption. Of course, the thoroughly educated person always spells correctly; but how many are thoroughly educated, or, if they ever were so, have been able to retain their acquirements?—London Globe.

No Faces at the Windows.

New Yorkers never sit in their windows to enjoy the entertainment furnished by the procession of people and vehicles, writes a New York correspondent of The St. Louis Republic.

I do not believe I have seen a genuinely fashionable New York man or woman looking out of a window of their own houses in years. It is an unspoken and unwritten law that you shall keep out of sight, and the interior of your houses with layer on layer of lace curtains, often times of them as many as four different sets of them at each window. The only time a man is privileged to watch the promenaders is at his club, and there many of them do it with a vengeance, as you may never look into the street from her door. You may walk down Fifth avenue at any time of day, and under no circumstances, unless a conspicuous and the alleged intention of "good form" is to remain screened from the vulgar scrutiny of the public.

But it is well enough to set down this particular feature of our advanced condition of civilization, because, if I am not mistaken, the enjoyable habit of sitting in windows is preserved in most other cities. Of course, we lose a vast amount of entertainment by foregoing the habit, for a study of human nature as you find it on the street is educating and charming. But here we are, for the sake of that severe granddame Good Form, velling the sun and our fellow creatures from our fashionable gazes by these very stunning sets of expensive curtains. It is like a theatre with the drop always closing the pictures behind it.

The Beautiful Red Bird.

I have never been able to find an instance in which red birds have been bred in captivity, and although so many thousands are kept as pets, all or nearly all must have been trapped. This year I thought my birds were going to make a record for themselves, but the usual failure ensued. The hen laid five eggs, but refused to sit. Then the male bird became ferocious and nearly killed his neglected mate. They are now separate, but whenever he is let out of his cage he flies to that of the hen and tries to resume his duties. Yet a canny bird can knock him out the first round every time, and takes immense delight in doing it whenever the opportunity arises.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

A fashionable authoress of the last century was Miss Fanny Burney, whose "Evelina" delighted Dr. Johnson and Sir Joshua Reynolds. When she had become famous she was the guest of Mrs. Delany, venerable, cultured lady, who lived at Windsor, not far from the castle where George III and Queen Charlotte resided. The king and queen frequently called on their neighbor, and shy Miss Fanny at such times sought her own room.

But one evening, when Mrs. Delany was in her drawing room, when suddenly the door opened. A large man entered, who shut the door without speaking. The star on his breast revealed to Miss Burney that she stood in the presence of the king. She retreated to the wall. The king advanced to his hostess and in a loud whisper asked if that was Miss Burney. Upon being assured that it was he drew near and entered into conversation with her.

"But what—what—how was it—how came you—how happened it—what—what—what?" he asked, in his usual old manner. Believing he referred to "Evelina," he replied that it had been written at odd hours for amusement.

"But your publishing—your printing—how was that—what—what?" he asked, to which she answered: "I thought, sir, it would sell well in print," at which he was vastly amused.

Soon she became familiar with the presence of royalty, and on one occasion had the advantage of hearing his majesty's criticisms on some famous men. Voltaire he pronounced a monster, and Shakespeare he considered little better than a fool.

"Was there ever," cried out this royal Solomon, "such stuff as great part of Shakespeare—only one cannot say so. But what think you—what—what—is there not sad stuff—what—what—what?"

Fanny Burney ventured to assert that the sad stuff was mixed with many excellences; but he interrupted her to say: "Oh, I know it is not to be said—but it's true—only it's Shakespeare, and nobody dares abuse him; one should be stoned for saying so."—Youth's Companion.

A Comfortable View of Crime.

It will throw some light on the inhabitants of Fernando de Noronha to know how crime is looked upon by the common people in Brazil, and it cannot better show this than by relating a bit of personal experience.

I had the misfortune at one time to wound a Brazilian laborer—in his dignity. He thereupon threatened to take my life, and was by no means careful to keep his resolution to himself. As the carrying out of such a determination on his part would have caused me much inconvenience, I called upon him in person, with the purpose, if possible, of dissuading him.

I found that he did not look upon the condition of an criminal with dread at all. He told me frankly that, if he should succeed in carrying out his design, he knew perfectly well what his career would be. "At present," said he, "I am obliged to work for a living; if I am sent to jail, my living will be furnished me, and I shall have nothing to do. If you are dead, there will be no one to appear against me in the courts as my accuser, and in the course of a year or less I shall be set free, well rested, and with the reputation in the community of being a man of courage."

In this case I saw to it that he had the opportunity of enjoying the coveted odium cum dignitate in jail without having to commit a crime, but in a country where wrong doing sets so lightly upon the conscience, and where it so frequently goes altogether unpunished, the criminal class is large as we should expect.—John C. Brunner in Popular Science Monthly.
