and beautifully blue and clear. It was like molten turquoise. The bottom of the ship could be distinctly seen from the surface as she floated there, and it looked for all the world as if it were made of solid turquoise.

The cabin was a small, stuffy apartment, without staterooms or berths. The beds were spread on the deck. The entire ship reeked with the smell of tar and pitch and of moldy biscuit and salt fish and sprits.

The poor lady, flying from home and now for the first time on the sea, every thing was so sad and strange and wild. Although they told her that in three or four days at farthest they hoped to land in sunny France, yet her heart was full of fears, and many a look she cast to the open window.

Yes, it began to be a question at last whether they should reach France, but whether they would ever again see land or make a port.

Day after day the gully scudded under a rag of canvas before the furious, howling northeast, rolling her gunwales under and shipping tons of water that threatened to send her to the bottom.

At last the wind moderated, and the sea began to grow more peaceful. Every one was exhausted to the last degree, then they knew where they were, and their best navigator had been lost. While they were debating what course to take a sharp sighted old salt at the mast head shouted "Land ho!"

It was therefore decided to fly to the coast and there take ship for France. Anne confided the secret to one of her maids, who succeeded in winning a trusty fellow servant to the lady's cause. Without such aid it would have been well nigh impossible to put the plan into execution.

But having once decided the lady did not hesitate. Her lover, with harness saddle and bridle, was waiting in a little wood hard by. It was dead of night when Anne d'Arlet with her maid stole softly down the dark staircase and through the winding corridors to the postern gate, where the old servant was waiting to turn the lock.

and he borrowed money in the most reckless fashion, but he always paid it back to the last cent. He never broke a promise. But he would cheat at cards at every opportunity. He couldn't help it. Every one knew that he cheated, but no man ever beat enough to say so in his face, for Castle was not afraid of anything that walked or crawled, and he was a dead shot every time his big finger pressed a trigger.

"Where are your men, Kit? some one asked with a laugh, though they had slipped him.

"One of those fellows is mine," said Kit slowly. "All the rest is gone—'sovereigns' he pronounced it. 'I had sixty miles to ride back, and I hadn't the time to lead two horses with the corpses of two horse thieves tied on their backs.' This was all he ever said about the fight.

"Perhaps a more villainous set of scoundrels was never collected than the prisoners whom Castle always had in the county jail. The jail was of stone and was at the rear of the court house. Inside the place was lined with shot iron and along the end ran the heavily barred cells.

It is easy to imagine the terror and despair which came upon the fugitives left on the solitary island when they saw their ship driven to sea. The lady immediately began to weep again. In vain poor Roger attempted to cheer her with hopes that the galleys would yet come back and take them home again.

Among them were some Portuguese mariners, who learned from the English captives of the island which they had discovered in so unexpected a way. After years the Portuguese mariners were ransomed and returned to Portugal. At Lisbon they met Zoro, a brave navigator at that port.

In a cheap down town restaurant, where texts from the Scriptures adorn the walls and cheer the hungry as they discuss the modest meal of the domestic pie, an old man was painfully consuming an egg. He was gathering the residuary food which clove to the sides of the glass, when the waiter swooped down on the table and cleared off the debris of the meal.

When the children wanted the places for themselves they would all take hold of his tail and pull him down by that. He was generally very amiable, but sometimes he was very sharp, the children were sometimes so wild, Lee taught Sal to keep his claws sheathed by giving him when he did so a little paper toy on which lavender water had been dropped. This would throw him into transports of delight. He would tear the paper into bits and roll over with them on the floor. With nothing but a bottle of lavender water I have become the best of friends with a leopard, a tiger and a lioness in the menagerie.—Indian Stories.

A WESTERN SHERIFF'S COURAGE. Looking himself in a Corridor with Five Prisoners as he passed them. "I think that the bravest man I ever knew," said the colonel, "was one of our men. His name was Kit Castle, and for some years, so long ago that my hair grows grayer when I think of it, he was sheriff of Utah county, Wy. T. Kit had his own peculiar code of morals, like a good many other western men of that day.

"He started out alone on horseback once when he was sheriff to capture two horse thieves. He was gone for a week, and people began to think that Kit had got into a bit of a hard fight, when he rode into town one evening. "Where are your men, Kit? some one asked with a laugh, though they had slipped him.

"One of those fellows is mine," said Kit slowly. "All the rest is gone—'sovereigns' he pronounced it. 'I had sixty miles to ride back, and I hadn't the time to lead two horses with the corpses of two horse thieves tied on their backs.' This was all he ever said about the fight.
