LINES TO MOTHER.

When I behold those silvery bairs,

And see the pall of wasting grief

Where roseate hues were shed,

The joys that mingled in my mirth

I had assumed to make you glad,

And came not from the heart.

For, oh! I marked with deep distress

Upon thy drooping bead,

Was but a feeble art

The burden of each care

By every jovial art,

In the winter time of year:

No joy was in my heart.

And feebler, too, by far;

So deep a trace impart,

And made you what you are;

And weighs upon your heart.

Full well I know it, and I strive

To gild the coming morrow

And banish every sorrow;

No joy was in my heart.

It won't be always so:

been charged—

This chastening cup of bitterness

The more that we have striven

And suffered in this vale of tears,

The more our joy in heaven.

Will surely cease to flow;

Then bear it, bear it patiently;

'Twas care that bowed you in your prime,

With horses that would your heart revive,

let. oft when mirth was in my eye,

And I have turned away to weep-

The tears themselves would start,

Cheer up, be glad-oh, why cast down?
