In comparison with other items, the expense figures that get the least attention from the spender those in connection with the sports of hunting and fishing.

"The outdoor sportsman may be about his household budget, might meticulously turn off every unnecessary light blub or insist that the thermostat on his heater is set at the minimum," says Gail Evans, advertising and shooting promotion manager, Remington Arms Company, Inc., "but when somebody fishing, he's generally looking out definite reason for this. To the hunter or angler, his sport is Big Medicine, to be taken in big or little sips and as often as possible. It is balm to the soul, nourishment to a tired body and sedative to jangled nerves. Luxury? Don't be foolish! To hear the sing of a reel, to smell the smoke of gunpowder, to watch the dawning on an ice-fringed marsh or see the moon rise over a wooded . . . these are all events of and mental well-being of the average sportsman and to count their costs in drab terms of dollars and cents is considered bordering on blasphemy. There are, however, always some sportsmen who do keep careful records of their expenditures. Hunting and fishing success is not usually determined by the spends on any given trip, so maybe record-keeping business is a mild form of sadism. It is not recommended for the guy with a one-and on our lands. "Hunting The Puma" as the name indicates is an action-packed account of a mountain lion hunt.

Hand line fishing still is more widespread than the average angler might expect. Many fishermen still use hand lines fishing from piers, bridges and breakwaters. Salt water hand lines usually are heavy, tarred lines capable of handling big fish which may be hooked. In hand line fishing, the angler should use more The advantage in is that with hooks spread at different levels, the angler can soon determine at what depth fish bite.
