The Tariff Issue.

For once, at least, in the history of our carried on in which personal abuse of the candidates of the two great parties meets ciples upon which each party, if successful, proposes to conduct the government are eagerly discussed. Both parties, in their platforms of 1884, pointed out the danger threatening our institutions from a great and ever-increasing surplus in the United States Treasury, and both pledged themselves so to revise the tariff that while enough money should be raised from taxation to maintain the administration of the government, no more than enough should be exacted, and that in reforming the revenue laws, the interests of all classes of citizens should be, as far as possible, equitably guarded. So far, therefore, as expressions in the platforms of the Democratic and Republican parties of 1884 are concerned there was substantial agreement on this point. The Democratic party, to its credit be i spoken, has honestly endeavored to carry out its pledges, but has found itself thwarted by a Republican minority in the House of Representatives and by a Republican Senate hostile to any changes in the tariff rates imposed during the necessities of a costly

In accordance with these pledges the Democrats in Congress prepared a tariff bill which reduced the tariff tax from 47 per cent. to about 40 per cent. on the value of articles This reduction, it is estimated, while affording a considerable relief to the industrial classes of the land would yet bring into the treasury a sum sufficient for all of the expenses of a government economically alministered. This reduction of only 7 per cent. is what the Republicans are pleased to denominate a "free trade" measure. The Mills bill further provides for the introduction into the country of certain raw materials free of duty, the lessening of the cost of which would not only cheapen the manufacture of certain articles absolutely necessary to the comfort of every family, but by stimulating home manufactures af- bushels to the acre, on stalk ground. tariff laws the government exacts a duty of whilst out driving a short time ago. 21 cents per pound on tin plate brought into this country.
