Exercise and Study Do well and long before he'll tell you

The question of whether or not ex tremely active play or concentrated study by a child shortly before retiring affects the child's sleep need not trouble mothers and teachers any longer for it is answered with authority by Dr. Glenville Giddings in "Your Child's Sleep," an article in Hygeia.

The sleep patterns of a group of twelve children were recorded by an electric device on nights when they had participated in these activities and on normal nights. Comparison of the sleep patterns of the two periods showed conclusively, the au thor says, that intensive study of their school lessons or intensive physical exercise in the late afternoon or early evening by normal children has no appreciable effect on their sleep.
