MARYLAND GARDEN WEEK
Ninety-four gardens, homes and public buildings of historic interest will be open throughout Maryland during Maryland's Garden Week, May 4, 5, 6, and 7, which is sponsored by the Federated Garden Clubs of Maryland.

Many hundreds of visitors are expected to pour into all sections of the state. Arrangements have been made for the opening of private estates which at other times of the year are not available to the public, and many of which have not hitherto been open.

Approximately forty more places will be opened this year than were to be seen during the last Pilgrimage, in 1931. The places to be visited include ten homes and historic sites in Harford and Cecil Counties, five in and around Baltimore, twenty-nine in Annapolis and Anne Arundel County, six in Howard County, nine in Prince George's County, ten in Charles, seven in Calvert and twenty-one in St. Mary's.

From Baltimore to the tip end of St. Mary's county on the south is little more than a hundred miles, while the places to be visited on the north and west are included within thirty miles. Thus it is possible to cover the whole area with comfort during the period of the pilgrimage, planning a tour for each day and returning at night to Baltimore. However, overnight accommodations have been arranged in different sections, some of them being clubs only open to the public during the pilgrimage. Tickets for different sections and descriptive booklets may be purchased from the secretary, Miss Rebecca Boyce, Belvedere Hotel, where representatives of the Federation will be on hand to assist in arranging tours.

WINS HONORS IN SPELLING

Bel Air High School of Bel Air, Md., led by a 14-year-old Duncan McRae, a ninth grade student, carried off the major portion of the honors in the fourth annual interstate spelling test sponsored by Goldey College, Wilmington, and held in the college, the gold ball room of the Hotel DuPont and the studios of WDEL Saturday. Nearly 200 contestants from high schools and parochial schools from four states participated.

The contest was oral and written and divided into two classes, Class A for students of the 10th, 11th, and 12th grades and Class B for students of the 6th, 7th, 8th, and 9th grades. Competing in Class B, McRae won first prize, a gold medal, in the written contest with an average of 100 and was the last one down in the oral contest finals broadcast over station WDEL. In the oral contest he competed against Class A students as well as Class B.

In the written contest for Class A, Bel Air High School and St. Mary's Parochial School of Wilmington tied for first place with an average of 95.2-3. Wicomico High School, Salisbury, Md., was second with an average of 98.

In the written contest for Class B, won by Duncan MacRae, second prize and a gold medal, was won by Marjorie Benson, Easton High School, with a grade of 99 per cent.

In the finals of the oral contest, Duncan MacRae was the last one down among all contestants, regardless of class. William Hollingsworth, Alexis I. DuPont High School, was second and Marjorie Reed, Aberdeen High School, was third. Each receive a gold medal.

BIG TEN OF FARM CROPS INCLUDES WOODLOT TREES

Forest products are tenth in the Big Ten of farm crops. They are ranked in value only by cotton, wheat, truck crops, tobacco, fruits and nuts, potatoes, corn and hay, and outrank 35 other major farm crops such as barley, beans, rice, rye, peanuts, and sugar crops, according to latest figures of the United States Department of Agriculture.

These figures show that farm woodlands pay their owners nearly $63,000,000 a year; that farmers received $5,636,000 a year from such sales in New York, $4,695,000 in Georgia, and $4,022,000 in Wisconsin. These sales are returns from farm forests and do not include industrial production.

In southern States forest products were from third to seventh in importance among farm crops, with a cash income of nearly $24,000,000. Forest products were first among farm crops in New Hampshire and Vermont, third in Missouri, and thirteenth in Ohio and Illinois.

Farm woodlands, the Forest Service estimates, provide an average of 2,500,000 farmers with supplemental cash incomes, plus wood and building material for their own use. The Forest Service urges farmers to apply woodland management practices that will keep their farm woods continuously productive.

Gathers "Missing Links" In Stone

Rural Archaeologist Gathers Store Of Ancient Implements--William B. Steel Believes He Has Discovered "Missing Links" In Evolution Of Man's Earliest Weapons And Tools

[By the Associated Press]

Port Deposit, Md., April 7--William B. Steel, amateur archaeologist, believes he has found valuable "missing links" in the evolution of early man's use of stone weapons and implements.

For twenty years Steel, now 77, has been collecting what he regards as stone implements of the period between the time man picked up and used natural stones as weapons and the era of chipped and more finely-fashioned tools. He has a large number, gathered in America and Europe.

"These seem to be missing links of great value in our efforts to ferret the secrets of our remote ancestors," he said. "They have been largely if not wholly overlooked, simply because it has not occurred to scientists to look for them."

Studied At Johns Hopkins
Steel has worked on archaeology in spare time during operation of his 400-acre farm, to which he turned after college and university study. He was a classmate of the late President Wilson, in the graduate school of the Johns Hopkins University, in 1883 and 1884.

He took off in 1929, to search in Europe for stones of the type he had obtained in Eastern United States and as far West as Ohio. He found them in large numbers, he reported, and brought back specimens from England, France and Italy.

"Those I found in Europe were, in general, rougher than those I picked up in the United States," he commented. "I think they are older. It is probable the first people of this continent came from across the ocean."

Large Race Seen
Steel has made no special effort to study the significance of his relics, but he says two general conclusions suggest themselves.

One is that the early races were more populous than generally supposed; the other is that the people were very large.

"I have found so many of these primeval implements," he said, "that there seems either to have been more people then than is generally supposed or this type of tool was used for a very long time. Some natural catastrophe may have wiped out the early race."

Weapons Unusually Large

"Many of the weapons I have found are unusually large. It would have taken large and strong men to wield them."

The specimens in Steel's collections mostly are of crude type. He is sure, however, that all are the result of man's handwork.

"Nearly all of them," he observed, "apparently were used for throwing or crushing. There are more of the battle-ax type than any other."

"There are no arrowheads, spear tips or sharp-edged implements among them. They date back before the time when man learned to chip and expertly fashion his implements. They seem to have been made manually by hammering."

Imitations Of Nature

"It is probable that some are imitations of naturally shaped weapons. Man probably first found natural stones he could use for warfare and other purposes. He imitated the most useful types of these and gradually developed finer types."

Steel has his collections classified and stored at his home. He plans to present them to colleges, universities and museums that may be interested so that "the significance of these implements may be known and the work I have started carried on."
