APOLLO'S FOUNT.

From the New York Evening Post. A WINTER SCENE. Spring has her bursting flowers, Her silvery streamlets, and her soft blue skies-

Summer her leafy howers-And autumn ber ripe fruits and opal dies.

gloom -The snow, his mantle's fold, And the black tempest cloud, his streaming

Vet, like the transient hours Of human joy, or, in a desert land, A spot of aprings and flowers The Arab meets with, journeying over the sand.

Sometimes a sunny day Will come, with boundless light and beaven of And airs like those of May Go wandering the wide horizon through. Tie morn, and warm and light The timid west wind melts slong the sir; The sky is soft and bright,

With a poor wreath of clouds curl'd glittering You hill-side's sloping snow, A spangled gauze of sparkling diamonds, shines; The frozen lake below

Plashes in dazzling spots or shifting lines. And where the forest's fringe Climbe deep and blackening to the mountain's

Beneath the sunlightes tinge The upland field looks out in glimmering rest. As the west's breathings come

Amid the maple's crimson sprays on high, There sounds a transient hum. Like music of the bee swift darting by. Where to the southern air

The hill-slope leans, the noontide seems to And melted snow-streams there Glittering smid the brightening mosses creep

The hozel branches spread Curled with their yellow tassels at my feet, And towers above my head The ever verdant pine, the forest's pride.

The snow bird, chirping low, Lights restless on this beechen thicket sere; The woodcock on the bough It fitful pauses roll its hammerings near.

To-morrow's sun may bring The massy volumes of the wintry storm; The strong blast's hissing wing May sweep along, to ruin and deform ;

And this sweet smiling scene Will turn to desolation cold again-This peaceful forest lean Shivering beneath the season's wonted reign.

Thus, thus with life !- the cloud Of wintry sorrow chills our hearts awhile, Then, bursting through its shroud, Beams on our way one joy, one holy smile!

Again the tempest's gloom Comes, with redoubled horror, frowning there : Gone is the transient bloom, And blacker seems thy wing oh black Despair! ATTICUS.
