LAPAYETTE AND THE INDIAN GIRL. St. Louis, we reached on the 29th April, amidst shouts from steamboats and discharge of artillery. An old French sergeant, called Bellisime, of the army of Rochambeau, was among the first to salute the Guest. M. Levasseur's chapter concerning St. Louis, is particularly rich in anecdotes and personages. At Kaskaskis, Illinois, he mingled with descendants of the French settlers, & with French Canadians. On returning to Kaskaskia, says M. Levasstates. Like us, he had just made on excurtonished at as we were. She asked him if it were true that Lafayette was at Kaskaskia, and on his replying affirmatively, she manifested a great desire to see him. I always carry with me, said she to Mr. de Syon, 'a relique that is very dear to me; I would wish to show it to him; it will prove to him that his name is not less venerated in our tribes than among the white Americans, for whom he fought.' And D sued out of the Court of Appeals, for the D public generally, that he has just return- in speaking thus, she drew from her bosom a wrapped in several pieces of paper. 'It is from Lafayette,' said she; 'he wrote it to my father, when he died, left it to me as the most precious he possessed. 'I spoke to Gen. Lafayette of the meeting with the young Indian girl; and from the desire he manifested to see her I left the table with Mr. de Syon, at the moment when the company began to exchange patriolic loasts, and we sought a guide to Mary's camp. Chance assisted us wonderfully in directing us to an Indian of the same tribe that we wished to visit. Conducted by him we crossed the bridge of Kaskaskis and notwithstanding the darkness, soon recognized the path and rivulet I had seen in the morning with Mr. Carie. When we were about to enter the enclosure we were arrested by the barking of two stout dogs, which sprang at, and would probably have bitten us, but for the timely interference of our guide. We arrived at the middle of the camp, which was lighted by a large fire, around which a dozen Indians were squatted, preparing their supper; they received us with cordiality, and as soon as they were informed of the object of our visit one of them conducted us to Mary's hut, whom we found sleeping on a bison skin. At the voice of Mr. de Syon, which she recognized, she arose, and listened attentively to the invitation from Gen. Lafayette to come to Kaskaskia she seemed quite flattered by it, but said, before deciding to accompany us, she wished to mention it to her husband."

Mary's father was a chief of the nations who inhabited the shores of the great lakes of the north: he fought, with a hundred of his tribe. under the orders of Lafayette in the revolutionary war, and a considerable time after emigrated to the banks of the river Illinois. Dying, he committed to his daughter the document mentioned above, as a powerful charm to procure for her the protection of the Americans. Mary handed it to M. Levasseur, who-- I opened the letter, and recognized the signature and hand writing of Gen. Lafayette. It was dated at head quarters, Albany, June, 1778, after the northern campaign, and addressed to Panisciowna, an Indian chief one of the Six Nations, to thank him for the courageous manner in which he had served in the American cause." The Secretary conducted Mary to Gen Lafayette at Kaskaskia. He saw and heard her with pleasure, and could not conceal his letter. and observing with what religious reverence it had been preserved for nearly a balf a century in a savage tribe.' The daughter of Panisciowna, on her part, was overjoyed at such a meeting -as singular, indeed, in its circumstances, as any which the invention of a novelist could have devised .- Amer. Quar.
