PROM THE EUTENPEIAD. VEXATIONS.

This teasing one to death so, I hate it very much, . When are you to be married dear?" And then they look with such A learing kind of air too,

As if the whole was known-I wish they'd mind their own affairs, And let mine be slone.

Such a tantalizing time tro, When every thought's engaged In thinking on the time to come, It makes me quite enraged, To think they all should guess what

In going to be done-I wish they'd mind their own affairs, And let mine be slone.

If it's envy makes them talk so, I very much regret That I should pain their little hearts, And put them in a fret; For I know that it's unpleasant, To think that chance is gone, But they should mind their own affirs, And let mine be alone.

Poor Ned he's very positive That something will go wrong-We've kept the matter to ourselves, Oh, I can't tell how long; Yet ev'ry body talks of it, I wish the thing was done-Then they would mind their own affairs, And we should be all one.

WOMAN.

O, women are angels in limbs, In person, in manners and features, But what shall we say of the whime, That govern those comical creatures? By turns they fondle and teaze, With what would you have me compare them? The buzzing and bumming like bees, For the sake of their honey we bear them. Yet women are angels you see,

There's something so charming about them Whatever their oddities be. O, we never could manage without them. There are some that resemble ice cream, Which boldly forbids you to sip, Sir;

But however frosty it seem, 'Twill melt with the warmth of your lip, Sir; While others like counterfeit grapes; (The best imitations are hollow,) With beautiful colors and shapes,

Yet women are angels, &c What strange contradictions they show In matters of conjugal bliss, Sir; While frowning and crying 'No, no!"

But O, tis dreadful to swallow.

They wish you to take it for . Yes Sir." Pursue and how swift they will fly, All panting with fears and alarms, Sir: Retreat, and I'll bet you my eye, They'll pant, by and by, in your arms, Sir; Yet women are angels you see;

There's something so charming about them; Whatever their oddities be. O, we never could manage wi bout them.

LOOKING GLASS BOOTS.

A city fop wore boots that lace; So varnished they reflect his fice; As thus equipped, he moves genteel, A pup ran barking at his heel. A stranger sauntering near the park, Asked 'what now makes that puppy bark ? Replies a lad with mind acute, He sees a puppy in the boot.
