LETTER FROM WASHINGTON IRVING.

The friends of this distinguished writer will be well pleased to hear from him again, and still more to read the following sketch of his recent journeying among the wild tribes beyond the verge of civilization.

WASHINGTON CITY, Dec. 18, 1832. I arrived here a few days since, from a tour of several months, which carried me far to the West, beyond the bounds of civilization.

Niagara, I proceeded, with my agreeable fellow travellers, Mr. L. and Mr. P. to Buffalo, and we embarked at Black Rock, on Lake Erie.

At Columbus, the capital of South Carolina, I passed a day most cordially with my friend P. I dined also with G. H., whom I had known in New York.

At St. Louis, we bought horses for ourselves, and a covered wagon for our baggage, tents, provisions, &c., and travelled by land to Independence.

From Independence, we struck across the Indian country, along the line of the Indian missions, and arrived on the 8th of October, after ten days' tramp, at Fort Gibson.

tip our horses for fear of surprise; but, though we had an occasional alarm, we passed through the country without seeing a single Pawnee.

From Fort Gibson, I was about five days descending the Arkansas to the Mississippi, in a steamboat.

New Orleans is one of the most motly and amusing places in the United States; a mixture of America and Europe.

over, when a prodigious subterranean noise was heard, resembling the rolling of thunder, but louder and more prolonged than that heard within the tropics during thunder storms.

The shocks were in opposite directions; from north to south, and from east to west.

Major Head, in his Rough Notes of a Journey across the Pampas, gives the following animated picture of the preparation of a train of baggage-mules for a journey over these dangerous Passes.

The operation of loading then began. The peon (the driver) first caught a great brown mule with his lasso.

little cut, and the bulletin of his health was altogether incredible.

HORRORS OF BATTLE.

The battle took place on the margin of the Niagara river, an extensive plain, which had once been covered with fine farms, but now forsaken by the inhabitants, and desolated by war.

The British line glowing with gold and crimson hues was stretched across the plain, flanked by pieces of brass ordnance, and decorated by a discharge spread over the field, and filled the air with thunder.
