From Blackwood's Magazine. Here is a small packet sent us by our Amevolumes, but in binding vellow, as a crocus- Then glad emerging from the healing stream, "Flora's Interpreter, or the American Book of Welcome, like thee, sweet flower, the dawning beam. Flowers and Sentiments." The collection and selection has been made—and tastefully—by Mrs. S. J. Hale, a lady who is an honor to Boston. We know not who may be the wribut we cannot give them bester praise than by gracing our pages with them, among pearls as pure as themselves-here are two of the firstwater, in the same setting-which do you love best, the American or the English?

NIGHT-BLOWING CEREUS. Strange flower! Oh, beautifulyl strange, Why in the lonely night, And to the quiet watching stars, Spread'st thou thy petals white?

There's sleep among the breathing flowers, The folded leaves all rest-Child, butterfly, and bee are hush'd-The wood-bird's in its nest;-

Thou wak st alone of earth's bright things, A silent watch is thine, Offering thy incense, votive gift! Unto night's starry shrine.

Morn glows, and thou art gone for aye, As bow of summer cloud; Like thy sister flower of Araby, Thou unto death hast bowed!

Once flowering, wilt thou never more Give thy pale beauty back! O, canst thou not thy fragrance pour Upon the sunbeam's track?

Thou flower of summer's starlit night, When whispering farewell, Bear'st thou a hope, from this dim world, Mid brighter things to dwell? Thou hast unseal'd my thought's deep fount, My hope as thine shall be. And my heart's incense I will breathe To Heaven, bright flower, with thee.

EVENING PRIMROSE. "The sun his latest ray has shed, The wild bird to its nest has sped, And buds, which to the day beam spread Their brightest glow, Incline their dew-besprinkled head

In slumber now. "Then why art thou lone vigils keeping, Pale flower, when all beside are sleeping? Are not the same soft zephyrs sweeping Each slender stem,

And the same opiate dewdrops steeping Both thee and them?

Eve is my noon. Let this still hour, When softly sleeps each sister flower, Sole watcher of the dusky bower A joy to be; And sonscious, feel the pale moon shower

Her light on me.

Soon as meek evening veils the sky, And wildly fresh her breeze flits by, And on my breast the dewdrops lie, I feel to live; And what of mine is fragrancy,

I freely give. "Say thou, who thus dost question me, Wouldst than from earth's dull cares be free, O, listen, and I'll coursel thee Wisely to shun Tumult, and glare, and vanity,

As I have done. Enter thy closet, shut the door, And beavenward let thy spirit soar; Then softer dews than bathe the flower

On thee shall rest, And beams which sum ner moon can pour Illume thy breast.'

In "Flora's Interpreter," the lines to the Night-blowing Cereus are marked "From the Ladies' Magazine," of which Mrs. S. J. Hale as editress. Are they really American?
