Opposite the Market House,

Summer is gone, and the Autumn With a stately solemn tread, Comes on like a king with his banners Waving above his head. I see the mist on the river, I bear the breeze on the hill, And the cricket all day in the meadow Is chirping loud and shrill.

AUTUMN.

Few flowers doth Autumn cherish, And he lays by the role of green Which Spring in her loom of beauty, Wove tair for the Summer queen. For he loveth the gold and purple In which monarchs of old were dressed, And the scarlet plume of the warrior Is waving above his crest.

Few blossoms doth he care for! Yet he fosiers the aster wid, And the beautiful tripged gentian Is the Autumn's angel child! Blue as the Spring's first violet, It nestles upon his breast-Yet, sure am I that he loveth The red-lipped lobelia best.

I know not why-but from childhood, The music of Autumn, to me, Has been sweeter than the vernal breeze Or the Summer's melody! And though it waken wild echoes And longings I cannot define, It leaves in my spirit a blessing, And a happier life is mine.
