

he did to his family, before he was sent to the Insane asylum. I know he was sent there and has remained there ever since.

I never heard any one say how he acted while he was in the army or if he showed any signs of weakening of mind before he returned.

I never knew of his having any bad habits - don't think he was ever a drinking man was always known as a quiet steady young man before going into service. before enlistment his owners kept him and the other brothers with him in confinement to prevent their running away and joining the army. The McFarish family were then owners of the soldier & his brothers.

I think I remember having testified in this case - I know the statements then made are correct.

I have no interest in this claim only as a friend.
