The yellow flute is "a Jonah" of the worst kind, and in the minds of professionals is on the same level with the yellow dog. A seen a funeral procession approaching, and in consequence retraced his steps until he reached some side street, down which h reach his destination. To have met that uneral, in his opinion, would have been to sign his own death-warrant within a year of the day. Another peculiar superthe occasion of the opening of a new theaopera house in a large manufacturing city in Massachusetts is well remembered by the writer. The play was "The Octoroon" and in the duel between McClosky and the Indian one of the parties received a slight blooded man, and "the carmine" poured freely from the wound upon the stage. The manager happened to be standing in one of the wings, and when he saw the blood upon the stage the tears could not be kept back. He cried like a baby, declaring that his prospects in life were ruined, and that the theatre was "Jonahed" by carelessness. And, to tell the truth, everybody who has undertaken to manage this self-same theatre has lost money. Base-ball players are about as superstitious a set of people as actors, and many of the superstitions well known by actors are as firmly imbued in the minds of the sphere tossers. For instance, if the members of a nine pass a funeral procession on the way to the ball grounds they go into the game in a disheartened way, feeling ed, that the game is lost. A horseshoe is considered by base-ballists as the best possible omen, and to pick one up on the day of a game insures confidence in the players, and they look for victory with as much certainty as they look for a good attendance of spectators at a game in Boston.
