Good luck comes to the brave man who fears nothing, not even fate itself, and who applies himself to the business in hand with all his might, and who says to himself, "I will succeed! Nothing shall prevent Circumstances are never too strong for this man. If he has disappointments-and who has not?-he steps calmly over them, and reaches out after the promised successes which lie in the future, and, taught by his former disastrous experiences, he grasps them and makes them his own. A man of this kind is a power. His presence is invigorating, like a north wind at the end of a hot day. He puts new life into his friends; his ome at night; the dog rushes out to meet him sure of welcome; the children climb on his knees and know they will not be repulsed; his mother-in-law wouldn't think of presuming to give him any orders; the very tradesmen know their man, and the butcher gives him good steak, and the honest granger who drives into town with vegetables never thinks of attempting to palm off any wilted cabbages or wormy promised to the faithful? Half of the poverty and want which abounds is the result of laziness, extravagance and bad management. Did anybody ever know a wretchedly poor family where liquor or tobacco was not used? Does any capitalist or manufacturer want to employ the lazy, unrelia-
